SENATOR SAM ERVIN SAYS

Washington -- The Senate tabled the controversial Anderson-Javits amendment to the 1962 Public Welfare bill, the so-called Health Care for the Aged plan. I voted to table the amendment. The nationwide controversy over this plan financed by social security taxes generated more heat than light about the issue. To properly appraise the Senate's vote, which was 52-48, it must be recognized that this bill had no chance of passage in the House. The amendment was to be attached to a House-passed revenue bill. For months now, the Senate and House have been battling over prerogatives as to which body will originate appropriations bills. Most observers felt that the House was in no mood to accept a Senate sponsored tax bill in the form of a rider. The House Ways and Means Committee had been considering similar legislation to the health care plan for months with no action. This bill was taken up without a written record of hearings and without a thorough study by a Senate Committee to help the Senate approach the matter in an effort to reach a proper decision. The sense of urgency was more toward bringing in additional social security taxes than for providing benefits. The taxes would have gone up almost immediately, but the benefits would not have gone into effect until 1964.

One of the facts lost sight of by many people is how much this bill would have cost workers covered by social security in additional taxes. The bill provided for an increase in social security taxes for all those wage earners and all those self-employed people who are covered by the social security laws, which embraces almost all those regularly employed or in business. To illustrate, under this bill, a worker employed in a factory who had earnings of $5200 in 1963 would have paid $201.50 in social security taxes instead of $174 for a 1963 tax increase of $27.50, by 1968 under the bill the same worker would have had his tax increased by $31.50 per year. The tax increases for a self-employed person would have amounted to $41.10 per year in 1963 and $47.00 per year by 1968. The worker would receive no benefits until he reached 65 years of age. Even so, the Anderson-Javits amendment was grossly inadequate to meet the needs of those sought to be assisted by the bill.

The bill would have imposed the same tax burden on a man with a family of ten children who earns $5200 per year as it would impose on a bachelor earning $10,000, $50,000 or $1,000,000 a year. With out the addition of these increases for health care, present payroll taxes will rise to 9 1/4% by 1968. Former Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Ribicoff warned that the American worker and employer will not bear social security taxes of more than 10% when he testified on a similar bill. To continue to attach new taxes to the social security system endangers the whole system and could kill "the goose that lays the golden egg."

This poses a problem which should concern all American jobholders. Already American products are struggling to survive in the world market. Payroll taxes are a substantial cost of these products. It is a matter of record that the Congress was being called upon by many sources to authorize a tax cut to stimulate employment and to pump dollars into workers' pocket-books at the same time this bill was being urged to increase the tax on the same payroll.

The Kerr-Mills approach to medical care for the aged, in my judgment, offers a better approach to this problem. Its purpose is to take care of those who need assistance in paying medical costs through the state and local governments. Taxes are not imposed to pay for medical needs for those persons who are able to finance their own costs. The Anderson-Javits bill was a change in the whole concept of social security which is to pay cash benefits to the individual who in turn determines what the money shall be used for. After much study and serious consideration, I reached the honest conclusion that the Anderson-Javits amendment was not a wise way to deal with this serious problem.
