HURRAH for HIWASSEE!

Barbara Ruth Sampson

EDITOR'S NOTE: The following article is reprinted from the March issue of North Carolina Education Magazine. It was written by Mrs. Barbara Ruth Sampson, a faculty member at Hiwassee Dam High School.

No one listening to him can fail to be affected by his enthusiasm. That was the way it affected me, certainly, on the hot August day that I first saw Hiwassee Dam School, up the road beyond Murphy. Perhaps that was one of the reasons why I welcomed my first North Carolina teaching contract.

I can show how I feel about this school by describing one incident—the business of moving the library. When I found two periods on my schedule marked "Library," I had no idea what was involved beyond going into a neat, well-organized library, there to stamp books, file cards, and generally care for library work, for which I was trained. At the first library period, I reported to Mr. King and was introduced to the activity involved: move a complete library, lock, stock, and barrel! The originally designated library had had to be used for the cafeteria, while the high school and grammar school libraries were housed in one room in the elementary wing. With the new cafeteria in operation at the opening of school, the high school could reclaim its library. My first step, therefore, was to move all the high school books from the elementary wing into the high school area.

In a sudden straight stretch that gives one the impression of getting a deep breath before striking into the real mountains, a blue and white sign dominates the roadside, introducing the large brick school tucked into the valley at the foot of the heights, surrounded on every side by azure ranges. "Hiwassee Dam School," the sign announces, and the perfect symbolism of the mountain eagle on the sign strikes one's fancy: An eagle among the mountains—that's what we are!

Hiwassee Dam is a school housing approximately 600 grammar and high school students, bustling with activity and enthusiasm, brisk with learning and the desire to be taught, presided over by a decisive principal with snapping dark eyes that respond as readily to humor as to the more serious aspects of administration. He is Harest E. King, president of the local chapter of the NCEA, and delegate to the National Convention which gave the capabilities of Lois Edinger larger scope for greater good to education. This is a man who terms himself a "working" principal; and, indeed, he is ready to turn his hand to anything from signing diplomas to showing the boys how to use the electric mopper.

It was he who showed me over the "plant." At that time, the new cafeteria was still under construction. However, his vivid, terse description made me see what it proved to be—an ultra modern cafeteria, beautiful from the stainless steel of kitchen to the blue and white terrazzo floors, to the modernistic use of seven different colors to produce an atmosphere of harmony.

Enthusiasm and Pride

Mr. King is always happy to put the entire school on display, proud of his faculty, pleased but not satisfied with the progress being made.

Evidence of School Spirit

I believe our bulletin board will also serve to pinpoint the Hiwassee Dam School Spirit. In trying to work out an idea for the library bulletin board for opening day, I searched for something symbolic of the school and the part it plays in the lives of the students. That was my reason for choosing the title, "Peaks of Activity," an idea that seemed peculiarly appropriate to the school's environs. In this panorama Mount Mental would represent the native, intrinsic ability that endows each person in varying amounts; Recreation would be the wise use of leisure time in furthering social adjustment; Athletics, the use of the body well and wisely, would represent that healthful and school-spirit-inspiring part of any well-balanced school program; Mount Moral was that peak which any school should help the student to climb; and, of course, there was the peak representing Knowledge, usually assumed to be the only goal for the school.

Crepe Paper Failure

The Beta Club, which undertook to execute the idea, ran into difficulties with the peaks. Crepe paper failed in realism. Five yards of white cloth did better but still failed to give the true impression of gigantic, massed peaks. Mr. King and our invaluable little secretary suggested that we use some especially beautiful art paper. Mr. King said, "From the way you describe it, I believe the peaks would look like this." Rapidly, as he sketched, peaks appeared, subtle shading bringing clearly to view the idea I had visualized.

With sketch in hand, two student artists enlarged and put into color the peaks of Mr. King's picture. With the final touch of the Hiwassee eagle, cast in plaster of paris by the arts and crafts class, the bulletin board was complete. The eagle of HDHS soared above the peaks of our various activities, the symbol of what we really hope and believe the school to be to each student.

This bulletin board is truly the result of complete cooperation. A simple thing, really, a bulletin board brought from mind to life; and yet it gives me reason to write this article, inviting all of you to come down beyond Murphy to visit one of the most ambitious, hardworking schools in North Carolina, one with students who, taken as a whole, are living proof that modern teenagers are people to whom we can safely entrust the future.

The faculty and student body of Hiwassee Dam School would welcome your visit. We think you would like this westernmost high school in North Carolina, Hiwassee Dam High School!

Boys to the Rescue

This assignment was quite a job any way one looks at it, and especially so when the chief mover is a new teacher to the system. The task became more manageable after a practical consultation with Mr. King. Suggestion one: The shop would furnish boys to work under my supervision in removing the books from the shelves, keeping them as nearly as possible in chronological order. They would then move the books by float from one wing to the other—time-consuming but possible. Then, these same boys moved the bookshelves, painted, cleaned, nailed, polished, mopped, and waxed. Have you heard it said that modern teenage boys do not know how to work, follow directions, be efficient, cooperative, or courteous? If you have, I would like to introduce you to the HDHS boys and suggest that you work side by side with them for some weeks. Such an experience will give you a new view of the modern generation.

When everything was in readiness to receive the books, I learned that the only available study-hall was made up entirely of freshmen girls, not the juniors or seniors that one would think essential for sorting and shelving a library. Those little freshmen recruits, however—bless their hearts—did stalwart service; they still form the strong central core for the library assistants who help keep the library operating efficiently. They still assist in preparing a shelf list and in helping keep the card catalog in perfect order.
