Justifiable Homicide

I am often asked this question: "Do the stories in your column have any basis in fact?" Now, I think that is an unfair question, and to all unfair questions I think I have a right, a writer's right, to give whatever answer that happens to pop into my mind. But just for the record, I'd like to say that many of them do have some measure of truth in them. Some are true in their entirety, however, I have never felt that they should be individually identified as to whether they are true, or products, solely, of my own imagination. I'll leave that distinction to your own sober judgement. What do you think of the one that follows?

The one I want to tell you now is a good one, I have always thought-- at least, since I grew up.

I have an older sister whose name happens to be Georgia Virginia. Why Ma ever named her that I have never been able to determine. Maybe Georgia, because her hair was (some of it still is) almost the color of the red clay hills of Georgia. Virginia? Perhaps Ma had heard the song that contains this line "Take me back to ole Virginia." Anyhow that is the name Ma saddled her with. An I learned pretty early that I could really get her dander up in a hurry by calling her a Georgy Jinny. Then there was another tried and true method of stirring her Irish fire, which always seemed to me, to be close to the kindling point: And that was by saying anything about her being red-headed and freckled faced.

This was like lighting a short fused stick of dynamite. She did have a few freckles that she tried every known remedy for getting rid of, but they all failed. An when I mentioned the two together--the red hair(that she called AUBURN) and those freckles, well sir, business showed an immediate rise.

I was always very careful never to allude to either unless I had plenty of clear running room and a good head start.

One day, she was out in the back yard at the pump(an I don't mean a Fairbanks-Morse but an old pitcher pump) cleaning some corn for dinner. She was always mighty good to help Ma, which is a sight more'n I could ever say for myself. I came around the house and thought I'd engage her in a little conversation. I guess I started out all wrong when I said, "You're a red-headed freckle faced Jinny from Georgy." At least she took spontaneous exception to my opening remark.

She jumped up from there a snorting fire an brimstone. I lit a shuck around the house--she had a big butcher knife in her hand. I mentioned the color of her hair and them freckles one more time, when I was certain I had a safe lead. She hollered an said, "If I ketch you, I'll cut your head off, you little curly-headed(this was when I had hair) S.O.B."

Well, that there got through to me. It shocked me. After all President Truman is the onliest one that can get away with calling people THAT! The next time aroun I flew in the house(I done had up pretty good speed an to take off an fly didn't hardly take no effort a tall) an told Ma what that sassy youngan called me.

Ma dropped her sewing an called this little Georgy Jinny in the house. I could hardly wait to see Ma take Pa's razor strop to her. Well, Ma begin explaining to her what a terrible thing she had called her little brother, an all about what them words meant. Virginia commenced a squalling immediately. She was as tender hearted as she was high tempered. I kept waitin. Finally Ma told me to go an get her a good switch. So, she was gonna beat her with a limb, cause that's what I brought her. One that was big enough to whip a mule.

Ma asked me if that was the switch I wanted her to use. I assured her that it was. She said, "Well, hand it here." An when I did she grabbed a holt of me an all them licks she'd been savin up an promisn me, well, I got 'em ever rite then, plus a few that I'd no doubt be due in the future. I'll tell you the truth I's pretty sure Ma'd misunderstood who had called who what. She said she understood exactly. When she got done with me, then, she told me not to never bother this sister of mine no more, an specially when she's a workin, trying to fix us somethin to eat.

Talk about a miscarriage of justice. This was IT spelled with a capital "T". I reckoned that if she had cut my head plum off Ma'd probably called it justified homicide an a let it go at that.
