County Health Department Offers Advice, Treatment For Head Lice

With the new school year begins a new head lice the neck. Other places to check are towels after drying a season, advises Jan Reichenbach, public health educator at the Brunswick County Health Department.

In addition to advice about how to treat head lice, the department will issue a head lice eradication product to families who request it.

"As a parent, the first clue that your child has lice may be when you receive a note from the school nurse or notice the child scratching his head. Every year millions of Americans, mostly children, get head lice," Reichenbach said.

Head lice are parasites, which means they need a person for nourishment to survive. Lice are easily spread. Once they make their way to the scalp, they begin to feed, which causes the continuous itching.

The female lice attach their eggs, called nits, to hair shafts close to the scalp. Eggs hatch within seven to 10 days. Once hatched, the new lice reach adulthood in two

They then mate, more nits are laid, and the cycle continues. Head lice can survive for 48 hours away from the human body, and nits survive for up to 10 days.

Head lice are very contagious. They are spread through the sharing of combs and brushes, hats, scarves, sleeping bags, headphones and even stuffed animals. Once lice are discovered, every family member should be checked for nits.

Look for small grayish eggs on hair shafts near the scalp. They are about the size of the eye of a needle, and may be mistaken for dandruff. Check also at the nape of child's head, as well as the child's closet on garments.

Once lice are discovered, three steps are necessary to

"Several lice treatments are on the market, but the produce NIX is the most effective," Reichenbach advises. "It kills the lice and nits and keeps working for two weeks to prevent reinfestation. The instructions need to be followed carefully."

The second step is to remove the nits. Included in the package is a fine-tooth comb designed for nit re-

Since lice and nits can survive away from the body for short periods, the last step is to clean the home environment to prevent reinfestation. Vacuum everythingincluding carpets, mattresses and upholstered furniture. Change the vacuum bag after vacuuming.

Soak all combs and brushes for at least 20 minutes in hot water. Wash clothes, bed linens and towels using hot water, then dry on hot cycle for at least 20 minutes.

If stuffed animals are not machine washable, store them in a sealed plastic bag.

"On request the county health department will issue the NIX product free of charge," Reichenbach said. "If you see or suspect head lice on any family members, you may come to the health department for the treat-
