Many persons still think of these schools for juvenile delinquents in terms of the old ideas of reformatories—a concept which has no place in modern methods of handling delin-The training schools for children in quency. These training schools exist for two reasons-to give the youthpenal institutions but as training cen- ful offender a chance to develop in a new and carefully controlled environment, and to give an opportunity for working with the children's family during their absence in order to pro-vide better home conditions to which they may return.

North Carolina's program ranks with the best and most modern in the nation. There are now five permanent training schools. A sixth is to be built soon for Negro girls, thus giving the boys and girls of both races equal facilities—a goal which has been sought for more than a third of a century.

As probation officer for the Juvenile Court, the Superintendent of Public Welfare is usually called upon to make the social studies on children coming into court and frequently to make recommendations as to plans

Frequently commitment to an institution is unnecessary as adjustment can be made in the community. This is highly desirable, but if no adjustment can be made the training schools are a resource which we may

While in a training school the youths are instructed in such rudimentary branches of knowledge as is suited to their ages and capacities and are taught useful trades. They are, if possible, to be taught "the precepts of the Holy Bible, good moral conduct, how to work and be industrious." They receive industrial, religious, recreational, and health training.

Children coming before the juvenile courts in the counties, whom it has been decided will benefit from a period at the training institutions, are placed in charge of the county superintendent of public welfare for transportation to the school. Before any boy or girl is accepted at an institution, a thorough case study is made and complete information filed with the school by the home welfare department. The school, in turn, sends reports on the child's progress under school regulations to the County Welfare Superintendent who is thus in a position to work with the family in preparation for the return of the boy or girl to the community.

Without this transfer of information the school would be handicapped in handling the child because of insufficient knowledge of his case. Without it the welfare agency would not be able to try to correct detrimental home conditions before the youth is released from the institu-

Without any change in factors that ontributed originally to the youth's delinquency, the time spent at the training school would often become valueless. By proper modification of the home influences and preparation of the family to assume its responsibility for the conduct of the child, the months of institutional experience can be solidified into a pattern that develops in adulthood into upstanding, law-abiding citizenship.

Despite the length of time a child remains in a training school, he still requires skillful help when he returns to his own home. In North Carolina the local agency that works with the family in preparing it to assume responsibility for helping the child make a good adjustment is the County Welfare Department, and it must follow up the program of train ing received at the school.

The State's facilities for re-direction of youthful delinquents, require more adequate personnel and physi-cal improvement. However, what is needed just as much is a thorough understanding by the people of each community that a term at a training school is not alone sufficient for a delinquent youth. There must also be work in the community and with the family to alleviate the causes that led originally to the child's maladjustment and antisocial behavior. The child must be accepted back in the community, not as an ex-delinquent but as a future citizen. He must be given work and must be trusted. Juvenile delinquents result when communities do not make adequate provision for meeting the needs of children and youth. The level of any community can be determined by social adjustment of its children.
