Too Much "Opinion News" Appears

The complete failure of professional journalists and radio commentators to accurately gauge public opinion in connection with the Presidential contest leads one to wonder whether the same gentlemen might not be equally mistaken in connection with other views assiduously promoted.

The professional poll-takers, who claim to have scientific methods of determining what the people are thinking, have been thoroughly discredited by the results of the election. Not one of them gave President Truman a chance for re-election and on the basis of their past successes in forecasting election results, led many people to the erroneous conclusion that Mr. Truman and the Democrats were to be the victims of a great Republican landslide.

These errors on the part of both classes of individuals, naturally shake the confidence of the public in what they read and what they hear. In our opinion this is a good thing. There is entirely too much space given in the press to the printing of opinion-news. The same observation applies to time on the air.

After all, opinions may be interesting but they are not a substitute for news and we hope that the lesson of the Presidential election will lead the press and the radio to a more intelligent effort to report what happens instead of what somebody thinks will happen.

People who know nothing about a problem can give you an answer without waiting to think.

The trouble with some religionists is that they are solely worried by the mistakes of other people.

When the policies of this nation are determined by selfish interests, acting for themselves and oblivious to the general welfare, the nation is doomed.
