Statistical

Here are some economic statistics that you can interpret for yourself:

There were 3,200,000 unemployed in February, which was the highest number of people out of work since the war.

During the same month, there were 57,168,000 persons at work, which was the highest total employment for the month of February on record.

The explanation seems to be in the greatly increased number of people at work and "seeking work." Incidentally, of those out of work, 1,803,916 were getting jobless benefits at the end of February.

Overlooks Half Of It

Because the "purchasing power represented by agriculture" is of "vital and fundamental importance to the whole economic structure of the nation," Louis Bromfield, novelist and agricultural writer, says that any modification of the farm subsidy program "will have to be brought about gradually."

Mr. Bromfield admits that there is no worse enemy of parities, support prices and agricultural subsidies than himself and alleges that the American farmer, although potentially able to produce food or cotton more cheaply than anywhere else in the world, has the world's highest production cost. This, he adds, means higher prices and taxes for city dwellers.

We do not have a full account of the speech recently delivered in Cincinnati by Mr. Bromfield, alleging that our agriculture is "kept" by the tax money "of the city taxpayer," which pays for the Government's program. Mr. Bromfield suggests that the final answer to the problem "lies in a better agriculture."

While a better agriculture would be for the general benefit of farmers and the nation alike, we are somewhat surprised that Mr. Bromfield, in his strictures against the assistance being extended to agriculture, does not denounce the subsidies given manufacturers under the protective tariff laws, which operate for the benefit of industry.

Certainly, if the farmers of the nation are compelled to buy what they need from a "protected" industry, they should not be expected to sell what they produce on a "free" market.

850 Miles Per Hour

It is officially admitted that the Air Force's tiny "faster-than-sound" test plane has flown faster than 850 miles an hour and reached an altitude above 40,000 feet.

This is indicative of what may be ahead in the way of rocket-powered planes. Better performance is expected of another man-piloted plane which officials expect to reach 1,700-miles-an-hour and 80,000 feet in altitude.

While details are scarce, one should not presume that the rocket ship is already perfected or that its test flights, with the unusual speed, have lasted for any considerable length of time.
