U. S. Study Points Up Disparities In Prices For Homes Versus Incomes

The question of whether new housing has tended to price itself out of the mass market on which it is dependent for a high level of activity is raised in a recent study of the U. S. Department of Labor. Taking the period between 1950 and 1956, and comparing the trend of family income levels and prices of new single family non-farm homes between those years, the study concludes that the pricing of new homes seemed better fitted to income in 1956 than it was in 1950. Data are not yet available to indicate whether this relationship has changed over the past year.

Importance of Problem Here is a problem that has ap- parently received only passing at- tention in current anti-recession thinking. That is the question of the extent that maladjustments have developed between prices and average family income, in other key areas of the economy as well as in housing, as the re- sult of the inflationary trend of recent years.

While concentration on the course of employment and gen- eral economic activity is natural under present circumstances, the fact is that living costs have been going up persistently and are now at record high levels. This is hardly a constructive develop- ment for the wage and salary earner or for those dependent on savings or other fixed incomes. Today there are 62 million per- sons holding down a job, repre- senting 92 out of every 100 in the working population, and earning about $235 billions a year in wages and salaries, according to the latest figures.

Factor of Inflation In a mass market economy such as ours, it is the wage and salary earners' spending and saving de- cisions, and the purchasing power of their dollars, that have such a dominant influence on the course of business, as has always been the case. Despite the continued inflationary symptoms in living costs and prices and the upward pressure on production costs, it is significant to note the major dis- cussion in and out of Government seems to be on how to prime the economic pump and create more purchasing power with little thought as to the consequences, on the buying power of the dollar.

The Department of Labor anal- ysis of the housing market points out that a noticeable discrepancy seems to have developed between family income levels and the selling price of new homes since the turn of the present decade. In 1950, the figures show, close to a quarter of all American families had incomes of $5,000 a year or more. This matched the propor- tion of all new one-family non-farm homes that were built in that year in the upper new home selling price bracket then pre- vailing of $12,500 and over. Us- ing the accepted rule of thumb that the purchase price of a home should not exceed an annual 2 1/2 times the purchaser's amount income, the study says that there appeared to be no overbuilding in the higher-priced housing range in 1950.

By 1956, however, this relation- ship had changed. The figures show that a total of 33 per cent of all American families were then in the $6,000 and over an- nual income bracket, a big up- grading in the intervening years; but the proportion of higher- priced homes increased even more in the period, with a total of 44 per cent of new single family nonfarm homes built in that year priced at $15,000 and over. Leav- ing out rising costs of home maintenance, the uptrend in prop- erty taxes, etc., these percentage changes alone suggest that more homes are being built in the up- per price range than are consist- ent with the proportion of fami- lies with incomes to qualify them as potential buyers.

Forces in Housing Market Of course, demand for housing and the size of the market for new homes reflect the interplay of many forces, social as well as economic. Some, like the early post-World War II housing short- age, are more transient in nature than basic long-range factors like new household formation. New household formation is currently in a downturn, and ac- cording to the U. S. Bureau of the Census is not expected to reach the highs of the 1947-51 period until the middle Sixties. How- ever, ample mortgage funds are available for home owners from life insurance and other thrift in- stitutions, and the desire for im- proved housing is a basic part of the American character. pricing of new homes in relation to family incomes would be a fur- ther contribution to maintaining a high level of residential building, and thereby supporting renewed economic expansion on a sound basis.

SOCIETY MEETS The Ladies' Missionary Society of Berea Church of Christ held its meeting Friday night at the home of Mrs. Dennis Eure.

The meeting was called to or- der by the president, Mrs. Whit Cartwright. Mrs. Watson Eure read the First Psalm. Mrs. Horace Miller led in prayer. Mrs. Belvin Eure called the roll with the follow- ing members present: Mrs. Hor- ace Miller, Mrs. J. P. Don't Increase Hog Numbers Recklessly North Carolina farmers should not increase their hog flocks at a reckless rate. J. R. Woodard, animal husbandry specialist for the N. C. Agri- cultural Extension Service, says that despite the fact that hog prices are around twice the 1955 low of $11 per hundred, farmers should expand cautiously. He advises farmers to continue to strive to produce higher quality, meat-type hogs that will help increase the consumption of pork. This will help keep the market price of hogs high. As he puts it, "We do not want $11 hogs again. A quality prod- uct will help prevent this." Woodard also urges farmers to push their spring pigs and try to market them by August 15. Prices usually hit their peak in July and early August.
