Food Processing Centers Being Expanded In State

North Carolina is expanding its efforts to help speed further development of its fast-growing food processing industry.

To be added is a $23 million food science building at North Carolina State of the University of North Carolina in Raleigh.

This modernistic, complex structure will be used to expand the research activities now being done by the Food Science Department of the college, to teach students in food processing, and to carry on work with dairy products, fruits and vegetables, seafoods, poultry and meats.

Officials of the North Carolina Department of Conservation and Development, the Tar Heel State's chief development agency, feel the addition of the new food science building on N. C. State's 75-year-old campus will be of increasing benefit to the State's existing food processing industry by supplying more trained technical personnel needed by it and by meeting the needs of plants that will locate in the State in the future.

New techniques in food process are constantly being developed at North Carolina State. Examples: sweet potato flakes, freeze-dried shrimp, dehydrated meats, and numerous others.

The fact that agricultural income in North Carolina has risen from $216 million to more than $2.25 billion in 1963 has been an important factor in the growth of the State's food processing industry. More and better quality foods are being grown.

That North Carolina is making wider use of the great variety of goods it grows in increasing volume is indicated by the fact it now has approximately 1200 food processing plants producing products that gross almost $1 billion annually. A total of $45,527,000 in capital investments was announced in 1961-64 for 209 new and expanded food processing plants in the State.

A trained staff in the Food Processing Section of the North Carolina Department of Conservation and Development in Raleigh works in and out of the State with food processors in assisting them with site selections and working out plans to guarantee them the raw material they will need for a successful operation.

Almost anyone can plan, but it takes work and intelligence to execute a program.

Sales Tax Guide Compiled by IRS

The Internal Revenue Service has published its new Document No. 5327. The document, reproduced here, indicates the amount of N. C. sales tax which the IRS will automatically allow taxpayers to deduct on their federal income tax returns. The amount deductible is based on the taxpayer's income and the number of dependents he has.

To claim the deduction, however, the taxpayer must itemize his personal deductions on page two of Form 1040.

Sales tax paid on the purchase of an automobile would be deductible separately. The table does not take this item into account. N. C. gas tax is also deductible separately.

Internal Revenue further explained that this year's table shows deductible amounts which are generally lower than those used last year. The principal reason for this is that the old tables were based on a 1950 Bureau of Labor statistics study of consumer spending data; the new table is based on consumer spending data developed from a more comprehensive study conducted in 1960-61.

Rent, property taxes, mortgage payments, doctor bills, hospitalization insurance and many personal care items, such as haircuts all required more of our income in 1960-61 than they did in 1950. These items usually are not subject to sales tax.

Additional copies of the table are available at the 28 field offices of Internal Revenue here in North Carolina.

NORTH CAROLINA 1964 AVERAGE STATE SALES TAX TABLE

This table is based on the North Carolina personal sales tax of 3 percent. It may be used when deducting sales tax on Form 1040. If the table is not used, sales tax deductions must be itemized and substantiated. Deductible sales tax on the purchase of automobiles and gasoline tax of 7 cents per gallon are not included in the table and must be itemized separately.
