THIRD TRACT: Being the land shown on that certain map made by David Cox, Jr., Surveyor, dated August 20, 1968, and entitled, in part "J. L. Harris to Hertford Veneers, Inc.", which said map is filed with the deed and made a part of the description, and delineated on said map as follows: Beginning at a point on the north side of Grubb Street, at the southwest corner of the Hertford Veneers, Inc. "First Tract", (which point is 814.3 feet measured westwardly along the north margin of said Grubb Street from the center of Covent Garden Street), thence along the right of way of said Grubb Street north 83 degrees 45 minutes west 18 feet to the southeast corner of the Hertford Veneers, Inc. "Second Tract"; thence along and with the line of said Hertford Veneers, Inc. "Second Tract" the following call: north 6 degrees 15 minutes east 75 feet; thence north 14 degrees 40 minutes

Want to have your car stolen? It's a relatively easy goal to accomplish, says Julian H. Clark, Southern regional manager of the National Automobile Theft Bureau. The best way to experience the inconvenience of being stranded without a car, Mr. Clark adds, is to follow a few bad habits, which will endear you to at least one auto thief. When running a brief errand, always leave the keys in the ignition. Even better, leave the engine running so as to speed the getaway of the thief. If you wish to offer a slight challenge to the thief who enjoys playing games, you can make a practice of "hiding" an extra ignition key under the floor mat, seat, hood or other "safe" place. Mr. Clark said that about 40 per cent of all auto thefts last year involved cars with keys left behind by the owners. Such practices by auto owners actually serve as encouragement for teenagers to steal vehicles. Another bad habit is keeping your doors and windows unlocked at all times, as was the case in some 80 per cent of all auto thefts in 1969. This way, the thief has the opportunity of practicing his art of crossing wires to start the car's ignition system. Also, robbers enjoy rummaging through unlocked autos in search of stereo tapes, contents of glove compartments and other "goodies" that can be easily removed. You can whet the thief's appetite for the contents of your car by leaving clothes hanging in view, a camera on the back window ledge, or other valuable items that can be easily seen by any passing thief. Further encouragement can be given to a thief by parking your car in a dimly lit area where the known crime rate is high. Leaving the car unattended for long periods of time will help increase the confidence of a nervous thief. When the car is stolen, you can help the criminal by delaying in reporting the theft to the police until the culprit has time to escape. Forget your license plate number, serial number and other pertinent information, since this information may assist the police in solving the case. Of course, there are those who do not wish to cooperate with auto thieves. They realize that their bad habits that encourage auto thieves can ruin a teenager's life, since the police eventually catch a large percentage of the criminals. Also, it does not pay to have your auto stolen, since about 20 per cent of the stolen cars are never recovered. Those stolen cars that are recovered require an average of about $200 to replace parts taken in stripping and to repair damage resulting from frequent accidents by auto thieves. The NATB, an insurance industry organization, is still tallying the count, but it appears from early estimates that a new record of over one million cars were stolen throughout the nation in 1969. You can help prevent auto thieves from setting a new record in 1970 - and you can avoid the inconvenience and expense of being left walking by a thief -- by making it a habit to lock your car and pocket the key.
