Boat Owners Can Help Make Laws

What would you do if you could make the laws regulating pleasure boating?

If you own a boat, that question may bring to mind several ideas which you feel might contribute to improved boating safety or the enjoyment of boating.

Perhaps you believe that boat operators should be licensed like automobile drivers (that's been a hot potato for a long time). Or maybe you'd like to see more uniform regulations governing pollution control devices on boats (that's another one that's sparked a lot of controversy.)

It's likely that some of your ideas might be worth considering, even though they may not concern controversial topics.

Wouldn't it be nice if there were a place where you could send your ideas—a place where you were guaranteed that the ideas would be read and carefully considered?

There is such a place, and as a result you can have a hand in shaping the boating laws under the new Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971.

This new law provides the Secretary of Transportation with the authority to establish minimum safety standards for boats and associated equipment, give financial assistance to states for boating safety programs and set up a more ambitious numbering system for boats.

The new Boat Act also sets up a Boating Safety Advisory Council to help implement the law, and that's where boat owners can get into the act with their recommendations. The council has the job of making the new boating laws more uniform across the nation, and any ideas you have will be appreciated.

the Division of Motorboats and Water Safety for the N.C. Wildlife Resources Commission, has been nominated to serve on this council.

"We will soon be meeting to discuss what will be done, and it will be very helpful to me and other members of the committee to have suggestions from boat owners on how to improve boating laws across the country as well as in North Carolina," said Fullwood.

Fullwood and his staff will review the suggestions from North Carolinians, and present the best ones at the next big meeting.

"Suggestions need not be elaborate, nor necessarily original," said Fullwood. "We want to know what boat owners are thinking, and the more suggestions we get, the better we will be prepared to come up with good laws. We are particularly interested in suggestions which will help make boating safer and boating laws more uniform across the nation."

In addition to being chief of Motorboats and Water Safety for the Wildlife Commission, Fullwood is also incoming president of the Southeastern Association of State Boating Law Administrators, chairman of the committee on Uniform Waterways Markers for the National Association of State Boating Law Administrators and a member of the American Boat and Yacht Council which sets safety standards for boating.

Those who have suggestions or need help should write to Charles R. Fullwood, chief of the Division of Motorboats and Water Safety, N.C. Wildlife Resources Commission, Box 2919, Raleigh, North Carolina 27602.
