N.C. COASTAL AREA MANAGEMENT NEWS

Local permit-letting plans for Areas of Environmental Concern have been approved by the N.C. Coastal Resources Commission for most municipal and county governments in the 20 coastal counties.

The plans describe local programs for minor development permitting activities within Areas of Environmental Concern which will begin early next year. In general, minor developments are construction activities which occur on sand dunes, inlet lands, erosion prone areas of the ocean shorelines, and on the shoreline within 75 feet of estuarine waters.

Projects larger than 20 acres, structures which occupy more than 60,000 square feet at ground level, or activities which already require a state permit must be approved by the Coastal Resources Commission.

In communities with local permit-letting programs, applicants will be able to file their application locally and receive a prompt response from the local permitting officer. In most communities a local board will also handle initial appeals from affected parties. The Coastal Resources Commission will pay the costs of running the local permitting programs.

Nearly all eligible towns and counties have undertaken local permit-letting plans. However, Gates County has asked the Department of Natural Resources and Community Development to handle the minor development permitting in that county, citing a scarcity of Areas of Environmental Concern within the county. The state will also prepare permitting plans for portions of Carteret and Brunswick Counties.

In other action the Commission has appointed Carolina Beach town manager Sheila Davis and Morehead City planning board member P.H. Geer to fill vacancies on the Coastal Resources Advisory Council.
