ARTERIES AND VISION

If you're past middle age, you may be concerned about the onset of hardening of the arteries and how it may affect your vision. Hardening of the arteries is inevitable for most people, if they live long enough. But not everyone is affected in the same way or to the same degree, and it doesn't necessarily affect all parts of your body. It has a lot to do with blood circulation.

The circulation of the blood is accomplished by arteries and veins in a complex network that reaches every organ and cell in your body. Beginning with the largest vessels near the heart, blood vessels branch out into smaller and smaller divisions to form millions of microscopic capillaries, each filled with constantly moving blood to nourish your body's needs.

Any interference with circulation, however, may cause problems, especially in such specialized and vital organs as your heart, brain, and eyes. Many of these problems can be treated successfully if they are discovered early enough. That's one reason why regular eye examinations are recommended to protect your vision.
