Sanford pledges support

RALEIGH/The family farm, a cornerstone of American economy and culture, is threatened with extinction, Democratic Senate candidate Terry Sanford said today.

And "Republican Washington stumbles on... (showing) clear signs neglect," Sanford added.

At a news conference in Raleigh, Sanford pointed out that farm income has fallen to its lowest level since the Depression, that the US is/for the first time in a generation/running a negative trade balance, and that too many farms are going out of business. North Carolina, for instance, has lost 19 percent of its farms over the past five years, a rate more than double the national average.

Sanford said the working farmers who are members of his Farm Advisory Council tell him the biggest problem is Washington's "attitude," one he said they characterized as "neglect/willful, not benign, neglect/and pure disdain for the American family farmer/that it is all right for family farms to fade away."

Sanford outlined a number of ideas suggested by his farm council including: reforms in farm credit and in price and marketing systems; debt restructuring; development of a comprehensive fair trade policy; international cooperation in reducing interest rates; and a reduction of the massive federal budget deficit.

"As North Carolina's Senator, I intend to take the lead in designing a new farm policy that will enable farmers to make a profit from their efforts, and that will help restore dignity and vitality to our rural communities," Sanford said.

"I intend to be, as I always have been, the champion of the North Carolina farmer."
