think that they cannot successfully pursue a career without advertising themselves and their gifts. Publicity seekers are a familiar group today.

The spirit of Jesus was so foreign to such promotion of himself that some interpreters of his life have expressed surprise at this demonstration on Palm Sunday. It should be noted, however, that he chose this method of presenting himself to his nation, not for his own sake, but rather to acquaint them with his cause and his message. It was his final appeal to his people. If a dramatic element was involved, it was because nothing else had yet awakened their understanding of his mission.

There were various kinds of expectation of the Messiah in Jesus' time.

The people thought that he would come with a sword. With his own greater might of leadership he would break the yoke of their enslavement. He was to be the man-on-horseback, the conquering-hero type. But Jesus did not wear the uniform of any stereotyped idea. The threads of old hopes and dreams he wove into the seamless garment of his own creative thought. The only conquest he sought was an inner conquest. Even though material conquest should be crowned with victory, what would such victories avail? How could the Messiah of popular imagination lead the nation to a rebirth of spirit? How could men possibly enter into his kingdom, even though external changes took place, if they themselves remained unchanged?

To symbolize this different kind of messianic leadership Jesus chose a strange type of publicity. He did not ride into Jerusalem with the pomp and glamour of a warrior. He was not surrounded by troops and armaments. He rode in humility upon a lowly beast of burden, surrounded by peasants and common people.

Crowds on the road welcomed Jesus that day because they thought he was their kind of Messiah. When they found, however, that he did not fulfill their expectations, the shouts of welcome turned into cries of rejection.

But Jesus was not daunted. He profoundly believed in the final triumph of the kingdom of the spirit. Nor was his authority weakened by his knowledge of the rejection awaiting him. The traders and money-changers of the Temple covered before him. The chief priests and the scribes feared him. When the high priest asked him a few days later, "Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?" Jesus answered without hesitation, "I am." Thus he presented himself to men, not as a materialistic leader whose kingdom would be overthrown by time, but as a spiritual leader whose kingdom would know no end.

A. AND T. COLLEGE SUMMER SCHOOL TO OPEN JUNE 7

The 48th annual Summer session of the Agricultural and Technical College of North Carolina, Greensboro, N. C., the oldest Summer school for Negroes in the country in point of consecutive years of service, will begin June 7 and continue through August 23 according to a recent announcement of A. Russell Brooks, director of the Summer School.

The schedule, Director Brooks pointed out, will provide for more courses this year than offered previously in a single session. It will include courses suitable for raising or renewing certificates; intensive courses in typing and stenography; an accelerated program whereby freshmen may register in summer school and complete the four year curriculum in a shorter time; special courses in agriculture and industry, now available to women students; graduate courses leading to the Master of Science degree and a special institute in social service relating to problems growing out of the war.

The regular college faculty and a number of teachers who are experts in their special fields will be in charge of the instructions.

A well-rounded lyceum program has been arranged, whereby outstanding lecturers and concert artists will appear regularly during the session.

Modern cafeteria facilities in the college dining hall makes it possible for persons boarding on the campus to secure a meal according to their individual taste.

More than a thousand students were enrolled in the two sessions last summer, and judging from the number of applications already received, the approaching sessions will be even larger.
