Farm Questions Answered

Q.—At what temperature should the brooder be set for baby chicks?
A.—The brooder should be regulated for the first week to 98 degrees at the outer edge of the canopy and on a level with the chicks' heads. This temperature should be reduced five degrees each week for the first six weeks. Be careful to keep the heat regular and avoid running the brooder at sub-normal temperature as this will result in crowding and make the chicks susceptible to colds. One-half foot of floor space should be allowed for each chick in the brooder.

Q.—How should fertilizer be applied to the garden soils?

A.—Any method that places the fertilizer near the plants and at the same time avoids injury from the concentration of fertilizer salts will give good results. Recent experiments indicate the desirability of placing the fertilizer in narrow bands on each side of the seed. Practically the same results may be obtained by placing the fertilizer in the row provided the application is made a week to ten days before planting and if the fertilizer is mixed thoroughly with the soil. Broadcast applications are desirable when the rows are spaced close enough to require hand cultivation.

Q.—What is the best control for lice on my dairy calves?

A.—There are several standard dip solutions that give satisfactory results, but when using them be sure and follow the directions given on the container. The following solutions have proven very effective: A four percent solution of creolin, applied with a spray pump or brush; Cotton seed oil and kerosene, equal parts; and ground sabadilla seed and flowers of sulphur, equal parts, applied in powder form. A dip should be applied thoroughly in an even, thin layer over the entire body on a warm day. A second treatment should be given within 15 days.

Forcing Produces Blooms In Winter

Bringing a dash of spring into the home during winter months by forcing flowering shrubs to bloom prematurely can be accomplished by anyone, declares Miss Pauline Smith, home beautification specialist at State College.

Forcing is the process of placing branches of flowering shrubs or trees in water and keeping them in a warm place indoors, Miss Smith explained.

One of the easiest shrubs to force is the forsythia. Its many different varieties can add a wealth of yellow color to the home during winter days. Other common flowers such as spirea come into bloom in nine or ten days if placed in a warm window. Fruit trees such as cherry, plum, peach, and apple can be forced successfully and will bring a multi-colored profusion of blooms into the living room, Miss Smith said.

Those who like violets need not wait until spring for these delicate-scented plants to bloom. After the plants have been located, they can be brought indoors placed in warm places to produce flowers prematurely.

"My favorite forcing shrub is the pyrus japonica," Miss Smith declared. "Especially like the deep reds and blues, and it is interesting to watch the delicate shades which come out with the blooming period."

Pussy willow and alder are among the easiest plants to force, the home beautification specialist pointed out. Maple limbs are also easy to force and produce a pleasing effect when placed in a ropper pitcher.
