BIRTHDAY DINNER

Mr. S. S. Weir celebrated his Seventy-third birthday last Sunday, April 28th, at his very attractive home on South Railroad street.

A large crowd of relatives and friends, of which there are many, were there. Vester and his wife, Sallie, are the most lovable and gracious people that it has ever been my pleasure to visit, and I just thought how much better the world like them. They have a large family connection and they were there from several counties in this State and quite a number from South Carolina, and all were happy as they gathered around the "Festive board" with the smell of country ham and friend chicken and all the good things that you always find at Vester's birthday dinner.

The eats were good, very good, but I thought that food was not the only thing in life, and when I saw how smiling and happy he and Sallie were, I thought that I had rather be like them and hear the laughter of children, grand-children, and great-grandchildren, with the little ones climbing upon my knees as the sun in the west slowly died out of the sky, than to be a great man, even a king, with their family bickerings and strife.
