Strip Cropping Aids In Fighting Erosion
 Strip-cropping, virtually unknown in North Carolina until within the past decade, has now become a common sight in areas subject to soil erosion, according to W. D. Lee, soil conservationist of the State College Extension Service.
 He explained that the Soil Conservation Service has developed two types of strip cropping, one known as annual and the other as perennial. Each of these types plays a definite role in a sound conservation program.
 In this section, kudzu and lespedeza sericea generally are grown in perennial strips. Hay produced in these strips enables farmers to turn under for soil improvement a larger proportion of the vegetation growing in annual strips instead of harvesting these annual crops for hay.
 Lee pointed out that the turning under of these crops makes it possible to produce clean-tilled crops more economically and on less land. This in turn permits the growing of perennial strips on steeper portions of the land.
