 enough to over-ride even a Presidential veto, the House therefore passed the Smith bill to amend the Wagner Act.
 For many long weeks, that bill has languished in the Senate Labor committee despite almost unanimous agreement that a clear majority of Senators favor amendment of the Wagner Act and will vote that way if given the chance.
 Interrupted industrial production is, of course, more important now than ever. But the majority which runs the Senate Labor committee apparently thinks that the Wagner Act which it put on the statute books is perfect and needs no amendment. Thus a few Senators have been thwarting the will of two-thirds of the House and a majority of the Senate.

Of equal importance is what is happening while these few Senators sit on the lid. It happens that some of these Senators also are members of the Senate Military Affairs committee. That committee, oddly enough, has just voted for another extension of Labor Board powers.

The Military Affairs committee inserted in the bill calling out the National Guard a proviso giving the Labor Board power to prosecute an employer for an "unfair labor practice" if he refuses to re-hire a former employee who served with his country's military forces. Few people disagree that jobs for soldiers after the emergency ends are necessary. But many point out that there might be trouble for everybody if control of re-hiring were put in the hands of the Labor Board on the basis of that Board's past record.

Suppose, for example, that a non-union man went into the Army and his place was taken by a union member. Does anybody think that the Labor Board would have trouble finding a way to keep the union member in the job and let the non-union former employee look elsewhere? Few in Washington think so because that would mean that the leopard had changed his spots.

 Equally interesting is the fact that the Labor Board, encouraged by the dilatory tactics of its Senatorial adherents, is becoming what might be called "sassy."

To illustrate: The Wagner Act does not permit the Labor Board to have an "Economics-Division." Instead, it says that the Board should utilize the services of the Labor Department's Bureau of Labor Statistics.

But the Board for some reason set up its own Economics Division. The chief of this division formerly was an organization sometimes described as "pink." After a special House Committee investigated the record of this division chief, Congress decided against appropriating money for the Economics Division. But the Labor Board just changed the name from the Economics Division to the Technical Service Division, dropped a couple of employees, and went its merry way.

These folks apparently feel that nobody is paying any attention to them because of interest in the European war, America's national defense, and politics. They are feeling so set-up that they accuse anybody who wants to trim their bureaucratic powers of attempting to sabotage "social gains" and collective bargaining.

What they forget is that some other nations who have been ground under an aggressor's heel provide an object lesson of what might happen to people who refuse to recognize facts.
