More Fatalities Among School-Age Children

The opening of schools throughout the state drew this week from Donald Hecutt, director of the Highway Safety Division a reminder that pedestrian fatalities among school-age children have taken an upward trend in North Carolina in the past few years.

"As a matter of fact," the safety director stated, "the percentage of pedestrian deaths among school-age children in this state is more than double the percentage of pedestrian fatalities in all age groups."

He pointed out a total of 91 school-age children were killed on North Carolina streets and highways, 50 of these 58 were pedestrians, that is they were walking to and from school, playing in the street or roadway, and running into the street. This was approximately 54 percent of the total fatalities in that age group.

During the 1939-40 school term, 79 school-age children. This was a 13 percent reduction from the 91 killed the previous school year. But 67 of the 79 fatalities were pedestrians, this representing 84 percent of the total number.

During the 1939-40 school year, 56 of the 71 school-age children killed in traffic accidents were pedestrians, this being 80 per cent of the total.

"This high ratio of pedestrian fatalities among school-age children is most alarming," Safety Director Hecutt said, "especially in view of the fact that only about 35 percent of all traffic accident victims in this state and nation are pedestrians."

"These figures speak for themselves," he added, "in challenging parents of all school-age children to train their children not to play in the street and not to run into the street or road or attempt to cross without first looking both ways to be sure the way is clear."

Our Compliments To "Central"

Our two telephones, Nos. 41 and 81, are among the busiest in town. Hundreds of calls—and most of them urgent and important call—come in and out every day. The operators are always pleasant, nearly always right.

We've heard a lot of criticism of telephone girls in our time, most of it unjust, and so we've decided it's time someone threw a bouquet at the hard-working girls at the telephone office.

We doubt if a more efficient group of women can be found anywhere.

This is not "Be kind to operators Week"—just a tribute from a store who appreciates the good telephone service that is the rule rather than the exception.
