Schaub Outlines Needs For Progressive South

Before a permanent basic system of agriculture, flexible enough to take advantage of rapidly changing conditions can be established, the South must overcome undernourishment, soil and human erosion, and an undesirable system of tenancy, believes Dr. I. O. Schaub, director of the N. C. State College Extension Service.

While pointing out apparent needs in the South, the State College man sharply rapped critics of Southern farming methods, saying that "I am convinced that the efficiency of the Southern farmers has kept pace with the efficiency of farmers in other areas and with people in other occupations."

The South has been in the midst of an agricultural change for many years, he continued. For this reason the European war is not entirely to blame for the loss of important export markets.

"We can't expect to have what we think of as 'normal' exports just as soon as the war ends," Dr. Schaub told the meeting. "The cotton situation didn't get bad, the day that fighting started abroad. It just took a turn for the worse. We've seen, or at least we should have seen, the handwriting on the wall a number of years before the current military crisis."

One thing he said was certain, he said: "A confident people, a well-fed, well-clothed, and well-housed people will build a more prosperous South."
