Incubators Take Over Job Of 'Setting Hen'

The old "setting hen" is being put out of business by artificial methods of incubation. Commercial and semi-commercial poultrymen now depend almost on incubators as a source of baby chicks.

In recognition of this trend, the N. C. State College Extension Service has published a circular (No. 239) entitled "Incubation." It describes both natural and artificial methods of incubation, and points out the advantages of artificial incubation from the standpoint of disease and parasite control, and mass production.

A copy of the circular may be obtained free upon request to the Agricultural Editor, N. C. State College, Raleigh. County farm and home agents also will have supplies of this publication.

The text for the circular was prepared by Prof. R. S. Dearstyne, head of the State College Poultry Department, and C. F. Parrish, T. T. Brown and C. J. Maupin, Extension poultry specialists. The 12-page publication is well illustrated.

In discussing the advantages and disadvantages of the two methods of incubation, the State College poultrymen wrote: "While much has been said, pro and con, about replacing stock by the use of setting hens, there has not as yet been developed an artificial incubator that will hatch a higher percent of fertile eggs than the hen.

However, the chief disadvantages of this system lie, first in the fact that broody hens are not always available at the time they are desired; second, large numbers of eggs cannot usually be set at the same time; and third, the possibility of lice spreading from the hen to the young chicks.

The publication puts stress on the use of suitable eggs for hatching purposes.
