one, are barred from employment. Already there is a serious shortage of skilled labor in many sections of the country, and the increasing demands of defense production are making it more imperative than ever that everyone who can work should be allowed to do so. Because of strikes and racial discrimination many people at the present time are not given that right. It is pointed out that Negroes, for example, often face an insurmountable barrier in this connection. While the President has barred such discrimination in defense jobs, the path that leads to such employment is still not entirely open to them.

The discrimination that is levered against them by labor unions like many of those affiliated with the American Federation of Labor is one of the primary causes of this condition, according to informed sources. The A. F. of L. still permits its member trade unions to write clauses in their constitutions barring Negroes from membership in them and specifically setting forth a definite racial characteristic as a requirement for membership. Phrases like "any white person," "applicants for membership must be white" "any moral person of the white race" occur again and again. The phraseology differs slightly, but the idea stays the same.

On closed shop jobs Negroes are thus effectively barred from work, regardless of how badly their contribution may be needed by the industries involved. When Congress looks into racial discrimination against Negroes, observers are wondering what will be the reaction of the A. F. of L. now that William Green, its president, has been named a member of the Fair Practices committee, organized to enforce the edict against racial discrimination in defense.

The problem is admittedly a complicated one, and while its existence may be traced to several factors, those familiar with the facts point out that the industries involved are not to blame. Industry has taken the position that the "right to work is one of the most sacred rights of every individual and should not be denied."

A statement issued by Walter D. Fuller, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, says that such union restrictions and the less tangible but realistic prejudices of fellow workers are far more important factors than any arbitrary discrimination on the part of employers.
