WASHINGTON SNAPSHOT

for the spending apparent.

The budget for 1942, announced in January of this year, called for $10,800,000,000 for defense. By March, the seven billions in the original Lease-Lend Bill had been added. By August, the defense program was stabilized at a $5 billion effort.

The $5-billion program now takes of world more man hours of work enough to employ every single man and woman in the country's whole labor force for one year. Or, looked at another way, it would mean putting all present employees in manufacturing to work on a 40-hour week schedule for six whole years.

Washington behind the scenes talk these days is of the "stringent White House attitude on strikes that are hamstrung defense work. The fact is that even the pro-labor men around the President are beginning to talk of being stingy."

Congressional leaders are now drafting legislation with sufficient teeth, they think, to eliminate jurisdictional labor disputes which have been paralyzing business and industrial activity in some entire communities. The new bill would combine the best features of five measures now pending before the House Judiciary Committee: the Walter and Mansouri bills which would permit prosecution of labor unions by the state; the Quisen and Disney bills which would deny the benefits of the National Labor Relations Act to unions whose officers do not meet certain qualifications; and the Bennett bill to compel labor organizations to file periodic financial reports.

Some observers believe the President may try to head off legislation by some proclamation or stern statement against defense strikes. So far the President has already announced that the OPM would take action to reduce or eliminate jurisdictional disputes. A sympathetic note was the President's message to the AFL calling for a moratorium on strikes.

What's behind this startling change of statement? A number of things. The Bureau of Labor Statistics, for one, showed that strikes during the first seven months of 1944 cost $5,760,000 man-days. So far, present more than in the corresponding period of last year.
