

Victory Gardens At Army Posts

ATLANTA, Ga.—At Army posts, camps and stations in the southeast, 20 acres in Victory gardens and can be expected to produce 3,671,104 lbs. of fresh vegetables this year, according to figures released today by Head Quartermaster, Fourth Service Command.

That means 1,632 tons, enough fresh vegetables to load 1,230 freight cars which would make 24 trains of 50 car each.

The figures were assembled in a survey made by headquarters and included every Army installation in the seven southeastern states. The gardens vary in size from a mere plot, 25x30 feet, to an ordinance depot, practically a farm, 30 acres of gardens at Camp Shelby, Miss. The types of vegetables being raised are the usual run that will be found in any back yard city garden, such as carrots, beets, carrots, cucumbers, tomatoes, spinach, sweet corn, beans, turnips, sweet potatoes, tomatoes, etc. Arriving at the volume of vegetables that may be expected to be harvested on the total 68 acre of Victory gardens, figures supplied by the Georgia Department of Agriculture, showing the average production per acre of truck crops in the south, were used.

According to reports from camps now voluntary houses, are used at the general hospitals that have plots of gardens, most of the work is done by the convalescent patients in connection with the recreation program. It being pointed out that the exercise, sunshine and outdoor life do much to help the health of the patients.

General Hospital, Charles S. Shultz, one of the outstanding hospital gardens. It is referred to as a "farm," which was started in 1942 with five acres. It now has 20 acres, included in which is a chicken "ranch" with 2,000 White Leghorns and New Hampshire Red hens. From this farm the diet kitchen for enlisted patients is supplied with vegetables in addition to an average of 40 dozen fresh eggs daily.

Food shortages, either real or impending, are not going to affect Hendricks Field, Fla., says that post's newspaper, "Hendricks Field Herald." Continuing, the paper says:

"Nor will the feeding of Hendricks soldiers materially affect the food supply for civilians, for Hendricks Field is supplying itself with much of its own food. In fact, nearly all the fresh vegetables for Hendricks Field tables are grown right on the victory gardens, a 27 acre farm. The work is done by voluntary soldier labor."

At Hunter Field, Ga., there's a one acre Victory garden where the WACs assigned to the post are turning farmers in their off-duty hours and the boys down Hunter Field way will tell you that the girls are doing a good job of producing vegetables with some highly decorative flowers thrown in.

Down at Camp Shelby, Miss., they go in for things on a big way with their 80 acre Victory gardens, and are reaping huge dividends even this early in the season. Just two months after the first furrow was plowed there, Camp Shelby had turned in over $100,000 worth of food to the post Quartermaster and the superintendent of the garden states that products are for many additional thousands of dollars worth of fresh vegetables will be harvested.

The Shelby report continues: "The freezer rooms at the cold storage plant here this week were many bushels of home grown turnips, radishes, mustard greens grown on the 80 acre plot with the aid of 20 German prisoners of war and a couple of mules."

The GI Victory garden at Fort Benning, Ga., covers a total of well over 20 acres and is expected to produce a lot of fresh vegetables to furnish military personnel and their families with health-building vitamins, says the report from that post.

These GI "farmers," — officers and enlisted men — have planted their own gardens surrounding their quarters and do their own work, in addition to the 20 acre plot which is a project, under the direction of Lt. Col. H. E. McGinley, post exchange officer. This project, the report shows is a double-headed profit maker, as 100 cords of wood were cut from this sponge as it was cleared, and turned over to the post engineer.

Soldiers at the Fort Benning reception center are growing as new of corn, beans, potatoes, okra, pumpkins and egg plant in their spare time.

State College Hints To Farm Homemakers

(Ruth Current N. C. State College)

Achieving top quality in home canned products is an art requiring as much skill as any of the household arts. The following suggestions will help the homemaker reach top quality in her canned products.

1. Select fruits and vegetables in their best eating stage and grade them carefully for soundness, size and color.

2. Wash all products thoroughly, lifting them from the water instead of pouring off the water.

3. Have the canning room or kitchen spotlessly clean and in order before the food is brought from the garden.

4. Have all canning equipment checked, washed thoroughly, rinsed and arranged in order of its use.

5. Make syrup before fruits are prepared for the jar.

6. Have plenty of hot water ready for use in filling jars as needed.

7. Follow manufacturer's directions carefully for various types of closures.

These seven points of organization and selection will help make it possible to reach the goal of "two hours from the garden to the jar," which means not only better quality, but more food value per jar.

A particular warning is given against oven canning, described as dangerous in more ways than one.

Wrap a small square of clean cheesecloth around the tines of a fork and tie securely. Keep the fork in boiling water and use it to close tops of jars just before putting on the lid.
