"Housing" Sounds Good Public housing proposals, like so as the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill, found enough support in the recent Congress to get through the Senate. It failed in the House. Bills of this type have at least nine lives, and you can expect to see more of them later.

It sounds good to nearly everybody to say that "low-income" families are entitled to housing. When the real issues are all clouded up with emotion and sentimentalism, there are some who will vote "yes" without taking, the trouble to get down to facts. I, too, favor "housing." Housing is essential for everybody. But I am also aware that the needy, the unemployable, the very lowest-paid workers, do not get into public housing projects.

What Is Low Income? From all reports, the situation at a 550-family unit government project in New York State is typical. The law states that a family earning more than $1,700 cannot qualify there for an apart-ment. Yet, half the families in the project have incomes above the minimum, some up to $8,000. Only a very few destitute families ever get into government housing. They cannot pay the high maintenance and operating costs. Even government rents are too high for them. I say these things to shed light on the arguments of the planners, who dote on the goodness of the government. Their sentimental propaganda serves no purpose but to mislead. The T-E-W bill prom-ised to build homes for "low-in-come" families. Perhaps there are 10 million, 20 million, or maybe 30 million. What's the measuring stick for a "low-income" family? Who would decide about this? And where would they be put up?

To Get the Vote. A joint committee of the 80th Congress found that the Federal $2.60 Public Housing Authority, even with a "dormant" program, em-ployed 6,571 persons and used up 1.60 18.00 a budget of more than $11,000,000 a year. A major part of the FPHA's activities were devoted to creating a desire on the part of the 2.78 public to depend completely upon a benevolent government. Nor has the FPHA overlooked its opportunities to set up systems of 17.02 political patronage. The T-E-W bill calls for 500,000 units of housing over the next five years. Despite the tremendous cost of $7 billion, this amount would not even begin to satisfy all the "low-income" families. But it would be enough to satisfy many a politi-cian. Think of the possibilities for keeping the party vote in line. Why couldn't the government projects be put up where they would bring

Besides real discouragement to more private housing construc- tion, the government would extend its powers over all the people through public housing.
