STATE COLLEGE ANSWERS
TIMELY FARM QUESTIONS

QUESTION: How can I prevent weed flavors in milk?

ANSWER: The best solution appears to be in eliminating such annual weeds as bitterweed, garlic and other forms of onions, by the development and use of better pastures and crops, according to L. W. Aurand of the department of animal industry at N. C. State College.

Aurand also notes that such feeds as clover, lucerne, cabbages, etc. also give characteristic flavors to milk when fed just before milking. Several methods for the removal of off-flavors have been studied but none give promise of providing a general solution to the off-flavor problem.

Aurand says that the development of crops and pastures that will effectively compete with the weeds and prevent their attaining significant proportions seems to be the ultimate solution to off-flavors in milk.

Weed off-flavors occur chiefly in the winter and early spring. On many farms, either as a result of drought or overstocking or both, there is little grass of any sort, and weeds provide the only feed. As a result, according to Aurand, weed ingestion and the resulting off-flavor are quite common.

Aurand notes recent claims to the effect that feeding certain mineral supplements would prevent off-flavors in milk. Some of these products have been studied and results show that none of the supplements tested prevented the occurrence of off-flavors.

Favorable weather in September pushed the early fall in North Carolina snap bean crop to an estimated 84,000 bushels grown on 1,300 acres.

In the spring as soon as the buds or eyes are usually on the base of the stem or crown and not on the roots themselves.

The fall North Carolina cabbage crop is estimated at 24 per cent above the average for 1941-50.
