Free U. S. Press Earned Freedom

By DR. FAYETTE COPELAND, Director, School of Journalism, University of Oklahoma

Democracy, moving ponderously in its expression of the will of the majority, is effective only when the people are fully informed. A society which respects the rights and the dignity of the individual, which willingly pays the cost in wealth and in lives to protect these rights and maintain this dignity, must be an informed society.

Therein lies the vital function of the press recognized in its infancy; therein lies the freedom of the press.

The American press was scarcely half a century old when it risked its very existence to warn the colonists of the rising tide of British legislation limiting the self-government which had been nurtured since the settlement of Jamestown and Plymouth. Its dramatic protest was focused on the Stamp Act. When an aroused public forced the government to repeal this act, the newspapers continued their vigil. The press warned the people of each act which jeopardized their rights; news columns were opened to the famous committees of correspondence. Step by step the newspapers recorded and helped crystallize the growing sentiment which was to be expressed in the Declaration of Independence.

A grateful young nation, strengthening its government through a new constitution, recognized its continuing need for an aggressive press, and wrote into the Bill of Rights a clause guaranteeing freedom of the press. Thus the obligation to keep the public informed and the freedom to do so became inseparable in the tradition of the American press.

This tradition continues today. When the newspaper records the vote in an election, the decision of a court, the minutes of a city council, the acts of the legislature, the budgets and expenditures of public institutions, it is fulfilling its obligation to inform the public. The publisher may express his own opinion, he may warn of neglect or malfeasance in office, he may praise signal achievement. But final judgment rests with the people, and their better judgment must be based on full and free information.

Few there are who would question the basic principle of freedom of the press. At the same time, many fail to recognize that such freedom is reflected through many facets of our complex society. A public official who withholds details of law violation or expenditure of funds or the discussion of institutional policy, is thereby limiting the free flow of information.

Often the excuse is advanced that such matters are "none of the newspaper's business." No newspaper prints news, whether it be sensational or routine, to satisfy its own curiosity. Nor will a newspaper willingly submit to the suppression or withholding of public information.

The continued existence of our democratic society goes hand in hand with a full and free flow of information. And the press of America, in its colonial infancy, earned the right and accepted the obligation of keeping the public informed.

The Pilgrims brought with them the beginnings of a free press.
