Investigations Underway To Find Cause Of Fatal Accidents On I-85

Landis Satterwhite of Shelby, North Carolina district division engineer, said he would file a preliminary report on his investigation this week into the probable causes of accidents, eight of them fatal, on the Gaston County stretch of Interstate 85.

The study is particularly concerned with people who are going the wrong way on the ramps. The division traffic engineer says his department is trying to determine how drivers get on the wrong ramp, following requests from Gaston citizens to investigate the accidents.

The death toll in a head-on collision on dual-lane I-85 rose to two persons Friday afternoon when a Holly Hill, S. C., man died at Kings Mountain hospital.

Marvin Russell, 56, driver of one of the two cars involved in a Thursday night collision, died at 6:05 p.m. Friday. Harold Clary, 46, of Gaffney, S. C., driver of the other car died Thursday night.

Russell's wife, who was a passenger in his car, was transferred Saturday from the local hospital to St. Francis hospital in Charleston, S. C.

The collision occurred 100 feet inside the Gaston County line and about one mile north of Highway 161 on the superhighway.

The investigating patrolman reported that Russell was driving the wrong way in the south-bound lane when his car collided with the one driven by Clary.

An eyewitness, A. K. Dunn, of Durham, said he saw Russell driving in the wrong lane and tried to signal him to stop.

The collision occurred only a short distance from where Mrs. Margot Kuper, of Greenville, S. C., was killed Wednesday night when her car went out of control.

Russell's death is the ninth fatality on that stretch of I-85 since its completion a little more than a year ago. Two persons met their death since the stretch was opened in December 1963, due to driving the wrong way.
