California has successfully tested a machine that can pick sweet corn without injury. Rubber bars strip the ears from the stalk, dropping them into foam rubber padded chutes leading to rubber conveyor belts.

A new fluorescent lamp has been developed which seems destined to play an important part in plant growth, where supplementary (artificial) light is needed; and in after harvest ripening of such crops as tomatoes.

This is what is called a wide spectrum lamp which gives a more even and constant distribution of the waves of light found in the spectrum.

In the case of green tomatoes the light causes certain chemical changes which permit the tomato to develop a true vine ripened color. The ripening process under this wide-spectrum tube, also appreciably increases the shelf life of the treated tomatoes.

This should be good news for large tomato growers when early frost necessitates the harvesting of green fruit or the loss of the crop due to cold weather.

A potato harvester, developed in Great Britain, uses X-rays to separate stones and clods from the potatoes. A description of the operation of the harvester was broadcast by BBC as follows: "The mixture (potatoes, stones, clods, etc.) discharged by the harvester drop through horizontal beams of X-rays. The X-rays pass through the potatoes but are interrupted by stones and clods. "When the beams are interrupted, sorting fingers move aside and allow stones or clods to fall to the ground; the rest of the time these fingers stick out and deflect the potatoes down the chute".

It is reported that commercial prototypes of the machine, which is the first of its kind in the world, are being built. There is also a possibility that the same principle might be used for separating impurities from coal.

These are just a few of the many scientific advances which bring into sharp focus the changes which are taking place in our agricultural economy.

Spice CABINET

WHY DON'T THEY...
 • Manufacture shirts that will really fit tall teenage boys? They need longer sleeves than normal, and shirt tails that are long enough to stay tucked in.
 • Do something about the aggravating and inefficient inner wrappings used in most cereal boxes today? Either the wrappings shred when they are opened, or they're so stiff that they unfold during storage and cause the cereal to get stale.
 • Number magazine pages in succession and in the same place on each page?
 • Change the tops of the metal spice containers so that one can get a small measuring spoon inside?
 • Make baby blankets out of a material that doesn't leave fuzz all over everyone's clothes?
