

Death Crisis Family Topic

RALEIGH. — All of us make special preparations for the addition of a new baby or a new son or daughter-in-law into a family. But it is just as important to prepare for the subtraction of a life.

Although we do not plan to die, we need to get ready for the troubles that death makes in a family, believes Leo Hawkins, extension family life specialist, North Carolina State University. For how you handle this crisis may make or break the family.

One of the chief problems remaining family members face in the event of death is making decisions about a funeral. The more plans you make ahead of time, the wiser your decisions will be, the specialist points out.

Family members should talk about and make tentative decisions concerning where they wish to be buried. They should say what they want concerning future funeral arrangements.

In addition, both of the couple should be aware of family financial affairs.

Each person should know total income and sources; insurance policies and local agents; other securities and agents; other legal papers such as property deeds and tax receipts; location of will and any personal instructions; cash available not in joint account or jointly owned safety deposit box; family lawyer and financial consultant; and clerk of the court, who handles some of the proceedings.

Also think about what provisions you can make to help the remaining family with finances if the breadwinner dies. Remember, too, it would cost money to replace the services provided by a wife and mother. Education and training are insurance. Make preparations to qualify for a job that will earn what you would need to support the family, advises the specialist.

It is also a good idea to think about the different housing arrangements the family may have to make. The more possibilities you can figure out ahead of time, the easier it is to make a wise choice later.

Sometimes widowed persons make hasty decisions immediately after the death of a mate. They may sell the house and learn too late that it was a mistake. Or the family may agree to buy a house without thinking through their finances.

Any of these factors that can be decided in advance will ease the burdens that death makes in the family, the specialist concludes.
