Martin Attends Mine Safety Course

Ricky Ray Martin, employed by US Gypsum Company located in Kings Mountain, recently graduated from the two-week North Carolina Department of Labor Mine Safety and Health Institute.

North Carolina Labor Commissioner John C. Brooks commended the US Gypsum Company for sending Ricky Ray Martin to the institute.

"Institute attendance," Brooks said, "qualifies the worker to train his fellow miners in good mine safety and health procedures."

"US Gypsum Company shows their concern for employee health and safety by sending one of their employees to the institute for training," Brooks said.

The institute, now in its eighth year of operation, trains workers in the state's minerals industry in all aspects of mine safety and health. These people then can conduct training at their work places.

The institute is held annually at Rowan Technical Institute. Approximately 10-15 miners attend the two-week session. They receive instruction on mine safety regulations, first aid training, education and training techniques and other course work.

The institute is taught by the safety representatives of the Labor Department's Division of Mine and Quarry. In addition to conducting this institute, the division offers direct health and safety training for mining operations too small to send an employee to the institute.
