Student From East Berlin Studying To Be Rabbi

"Though Winston Churchill is credited for coining the term "Iron Curtain" in one of his post World War II speeches, the Talmud preceded him by many centuries when it taught that, "Even an iron partition cannot separate the people of Israel from the Father in heaven" (Psachim 85:)."

Rabbi Moshe Herson, dean of the Rabbinical College of America, Morristown, New Jersey, stated the above in conjunction with the arrival of David Lindenberg, 32, from Communist East Berlin, to study at the college in its New Direction Program (Tiferes Bachurim).

Lindenberg, whose parents were born in pre-war Berlin and still reside there, paints a gloomy picture of Jewish life in the divided city. "There are less than 200 Jews presently members of the East Berlin Temple. Most of them are past 65 years-of-age, having come to Germany after the war as survivors of Nazi concentration camps. The temple is open only on Saturdays and holidays. There is no rabbi to perform a Jewish marriage or burial. There is only a 'loose tie' between the two sectors of the city and only older people can travel freely between the two cities."

About his own path to Judaism, Lindenberg speaks very freely. "I was graduated from the Technical University, Dresden, one of three top schools in East Germany, with an engineering degree and had a good job when I began pondering about my being Jewish. I was aware that my grandparents and their entire generation were annihilated by the Nazis. My non-involvement in anything Jewish caused a void in me and made me wonder 'How am I Jewish?'"

"I began studying the Hebrew language and Torah with other young people who were also groping their way towards authentic Judaism and began to read books in German, English and Yiddish about Judaism. I obtained Yiddish newspapers from Roumania, the only country behind the iron curtain where there is an active Jewish life to some extent, which contained a wealth of knowledge about my religion.

"In 1981 I began to observe mitzvos, the laws of the Torah, and a year later I was circumcised by a Jewish physician and the East Berlin Jewish community presented me with Tefilin."

Lindenberg read about the Lubavitch movement in the Roumanian newspaper. When he was released from behind the iron curtain, leaving East Berlin in 1985, never to return again, he was fortunate to meet Fajvel Kogan, a Lubavitcher Chasid, who lives in West Berlin. Mr. Kogan encouraged Lindenberg to enroll in the Rabbinical College of America in Morristown. Lindenberg traveled to London where he met Avrohom Gluck, a London businessman, who accompanied him to the U.S. where they arrived in time for a "Farbrengen," gathering conducted by the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Schneerson.

"Seeing and hearing the Rebbe speak to the thousands assembled was most inspiring," recounts Lindenberg. "Since then I have heard the Rebbe speak on several occasions and each time I am able to understand more, thank G-d. I am very happy here studying Mishnah, Talmud, Chassidic Philosophy and Jewish Law. I know what it means to be a Jew. I pray that the other young people whom I left behind, who so eagerly seek to return to their roots, will be able to join me soon."

When asked about his future plans, Lindenberg responded, "I hope to study at least one year. Afterwards, I plan to get married and study more, perhaps. That will depend, to a large measure, on the woman I marry."
