'Stop Hillary' campaign traced to gay married Republican

by Beth Shapiro

A national campaign aimed at blocking Hillary Rodham Clinton's re-election has been linked to a gay Republican advisor known for running dirty tricks operations and whose marriage to another man was recently exposed.

Thousands of letters titled "Stop Hillary Now!" have gone out over the signature of New York GOP Chairman Stephen Minarik, but former President Bill Clinton said that he understood the fundraising campaign had actually been orchestrated by Arthur Finkelstein.

On April 10 it was revealed that Finkelstein had married another man in a secret ceremony in Massachusetts.

Finkelstein confirmed for the New York Times that he did indeed marry his partner. In what the paper describes as a short interview, the usually secretive Finkelstein said that the wedding had taken place at his home in Boston and that it was in December.

He also told the Times that the two have been a couple for 40 years that they live together with two children. He would not identify the partner, say who was the father of the children, or disclose who officiated at the wedding.

At a news conference about his foundation's AIDS initiatives, former President Clinton said there might be "some sort of self-loathing" driving Finkelstein.

"That fellow who used to work for Pataki is doing it. I mean, they give you two stories. One is that he went to Massachusetts and married his longtime male partner and then he comes back here and announces this. I thought, one of two things. Either this guy believes his party is not serious and is totally Macchiavellian in its position or you know, as David Brock said in his great book 'Blinded by the Right,' there's some sort of self-loathing or something. I was more sad for him."

The Stop Hillary campaign is trying to raise $10 million. The letter promises a Republican "truth squad" that will "monitor Hillary's appearances and expose her lies."

"She is 'the number one target for the right-wing attack machine,'" it says.

The letter also refers to Clinton six times as a "radical liberal" or "ultraliberal" and says she is the "darling of the wealthy liberal left — especially the Hollywood left" and has a "vast network of far-left contributors."

It appeals to conservatives across the country claiming that Sen. Clinton is running for the White House, although she has denied it on several occasions.

Arthur J. Finkelstein has run attack campaigns for a number of conservative members of the party including former Sen. Jesse Helms of North Carolina. He has also run campaigns for Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.
