GILBERTS

(Continued from page two) the central Pacific. The direction and the energy of this campaign implements the pressure that is being brought to bear on Japan's outer ring of defenses. It is increasingly apparent, even to the foe, that Japan lacks the military resources to hold all the outposts gained in that mad scramble that followed Pearl Harbor. Our strategy of continuous pressure everywhere on the perimeter of Japanese domination is intended to hasten these withdrawals while prying the enemy loose from positions that he would like to retain.

From Burma, through the south west Pacific, into the Gilberts, and up to the Aleutians the Allies have been mounting a continuous and increasingly furious attack. The Japanese have hardly time to lick the wounds suffered in the Solomons when our Navy lashes out in the Gilberts. Lest they be tempted to reenforce their aviation strength in the Pacific islands, a smashing attack by American bombers on Formosa reminds the war lords that they must look to their home defenses.

On the Burma front feverish allied preparation for a renewed attack forces the Japanese to allocate more men and material to that area. Even the war of nerves plays its part. A hint of praise for China in an official Russian newspaper causes the forty-odd divisions that hold Manchukuo to look to their weapons.

It is not likely that the Japanese will collapse because of their inability to hold these outposts. Yet as they fall one by one more vital regions are opened to attack. Whether the loss of island outposts can entice the Japanese navy from its lair for a slugging match is very doubtful. The Japanese have been husbanding their naval strength in recent months, but not for a classic sea duel on the Nelson model.

Raese, USNR, have been working out for the past three weeks. At this writing the calibre of the team is still an unknown quantity. Expected to start at the forwards will be Tippy Dye, J. W. Smith or Simpson. Stanley Skaug, captain of Dartmouth's great team of last year, will be at center, and Don Elser and Kenneth Laird are the starting guards.

Something about the players:

Dye attended Ohio State where he won three letters in football, basketball and baseball. In the hardwood sport he served as captain his senior year. Weighing only 140 pounds, Dye is unusually fast, and is especially adept in faking the opposition out of position.

Smith starred at Seton Hall, while Simpson has also seen considerable college action.

Laird, who at one time was a member of the Oshkosh All-Stars, is one of the starting guards. He attended Lawrence College and Columbia University. A very good ball handler, his experience is expected to aid the team a great deal.

The other guard-Don Elser, ex-Notre Dame-is the most aggressive player on the squad.

Other than the game this afternoon, two other games are on schedule during the coming week. Wednesday afternoon Duke University's Blue Devils will come here for a game starting at 1600, while next Saturday at 1900 Emery and Henry College will furnish the opposition. The Duke quintet is rated as one of the top teams in the nation; Blue Devil teams have been the "best in the Southern Conference" for the past two seasons.
