

Models for the new uniforms were, from left, Mary Lynette Flowers, Sam Parnell, Don Kimrey and Joan Hayes.

Flight crews appear in new apparel

Piedmont's pilots and flight attendants are now wearing their brand-new uniforms. The employees most visible to our passengers appeared in their new attire early in May. And as one of the flight attendants said, "Our fresh new outfits were as welcome as Spring itself." Customer comments and reactions have revealed enthusiastic agreement.

While the pilots' uniform was not drastically changed, the re-vamping was the first ever for our distinguished flyers. The new flight attendants' wardrobe replaces the uniforms they've worn for the past three years.

The new stewardess attire has, appropriately enough, a Bicentennial flair. It was designed exclusively for Piedmont and includes more than a dozen versatile and interchangeable items.

The girls' basic wardrobe is centered around a color-coordinated patch-work print in shades of pearl gray, vivid red and navy blue. The uniform items for the male flight attendants are equally colorful and stylish.

Image Wear by Rollins, a division of Work Wear Corporation, developed and manufactured Piedmont's Bicentennial Look for the flight attendants. J. B. Simpson of Cincinnati manufactured the new pilot uniforms with the Balfour and Mars companies producing the new hardware emblems and wings.

Additional pictures and descriptions of the new uniforms are on pages four and five.