SUNSET ROCKS

By - Mary H. Dupree

Perhaps the place of scenic interest most frequented by Highlanders, and the place most visited by tourists coming into Highlands, is Sunset Rocks. One finds the way by continuing southeast through the main street until well out of town and then taking the marked road to the right.

This road leads you up and up, past the stone entrance to a private estate, on up a rocky road, until a parking space is reached. Then a short trail takes you to Sunset Rocks, a broad expanse of rock flung lavishly down the mountain side.

Here an interesting panorama stretches out before you. Around the horizon, like a charmed circle, lie ranges of blue capped mountains. And nestled in the heart of this circle lies the town of Highlands.

At first it all seems strange, viewed from this bird's eye angle. But soon a red roof top here, or a church belfry there, stands out to give you bearings.

As the sun begins to drop behind the far horizon, these rocks catch the play of its last rays. And with the sun's decline perhaps a campfire flares up here or there to light the faces of its ring of picnickers. And as the smoke stream upward, on the air is borne the aroma of fresh coffee, or of bacon cooking on the grill. One turns reluctantly from such a spot as this.
