The following article was written by the Rev. R.T. Houts.

Those who have made a careful study of the growing conditions of our mountain region predict that this year will see one of the most brilliant displays of fall colors in many years. They make this prediction because the growing season has been unusually good. There has been an abundance of rain, and every tree and shrub has put out a very heavy foliage. Those of us who look forward to this time of the year remember the times when the beauty of every mountain and hollow has reminded us that nowhere in all the world does nature paint a more brilliant canvass than in our own mountains.

To many of us this is the very best time of the year, and the memory of the colors, the cool, crisp days and the faint tangle of wood smoke in the air bring a feeling of warm nostalgia to our minds.

Centuries ago, a poet who had lived intimately with beauty in nature, wrote these
