Behind the camera line the picture has prospered from the sleek writing skill of Phoebe and Henry Ephron, whose screenplay based on the play by William Marchant is a finely timed and balanced work, and from Henry Ephron's all-around proficiency as producer. To Walter Lang's seasoned direction, and Leon Shamroy's self-effacing camera, the production owes smoothness.

The story has Miss Hepburn in charge of the reference department of a television network, with Misses Blondell, Dina Merrill and Sue Randall as staff members, the four of them equipped to reply instantly to almost any question almost anybody in reach of a telephone calls in to have answered. To their highly-informed working quarters comes Tracy, who'd have been called an efficiency expert once upon a time, but uses the term "methods engineer" instead, and who measures the premises for installation of an electronic-brain (Univac type) he has invented to do the routine work for the staff so they can devote their time to more important effort.
