COUNTRY CURED HAMS

(SPEAR FINGER'S BRIDGE CON'T)

Whiteside when chased by the warriors. There she knew that she would be safe, for the Indians did not dare trespass on the grounds of the Thunder God. However, when the bridge was nearing completion, the Thunder God himself took the part of the Indians by sending bolts of lightning to destroy the bridge. When the lightning struck it scattered fragments of stone along the whole ridge, and it is these pieces of stone which can be seen today by those who go along the ridge.

Spear Finger was finally trapped in a pit prepared for that purpose and was killed by an Indian who had been told by a Tsikilili bird that her one vulnerable spot was her heart, which was always held in the fist of her right hand, rather than carried in her chest.

Part of Spear Finger's Bridge is within the city limits of Highlands, and after knowing the legend of how it came to be, it is interesting to take a five-minute drive to view these unusually placed rocks. Should one desire to trace the ancient bridge further, an excellent view of the cliffs south of Whiteside may be had from Whiteside Cove, reached over the road from Horse Cove to Cashiers.
