propriate $25.00 to the Kent Legal Fund as an aid in bail and defense of involved students. The motion was defeated.

Stage And Script

"A Streetcar Named Desire," a three-act play by Tennessee Williams, was presented by stage and script on October 23, 24, 25 in Howard Chapel. The play starred Kathy Hartenstine, as Blanche Dubois; Steve Bassett, as Stanley Kowalski; and Fran Mercer, as Stella Kowalski. The story centered around Blanche Dubois, who came to visit her sister, Stella. Blanche is faced by the unwelcome attitude of Stella's husband, Stanley. Blanche has created many fantasies to cover up her unpleasant past. She had caused her young husband's suicide; she was living in a world apart from reality. Her being the cause of his death made her continue to relive it. She loved him still, in spite of the truth of his life, and thus she gradually became insane. She was partly insane when she discovered her husband and an older man together, and she was overcome by shock, not wanting to face reality. Thus she created a dream world, a facade for everyone but her true self.

Stella

Stella, Blanche's sister, was divided between love for her sister and love for her husband. Stanley was a hard realist whose compassion was limited to his own desires. Despite his brutality, Stanley's love won out in the end. Harold Mitchell (Mitch), was used as a diversion between Blanche's world of fantasy and the world of reality. The diversion was temporary, and her dream world became her world of reality. A host of minor characters added color to the set as well as to the play itself.

Drama

This is the first time such a revealing drama has been presented here at Atlantic Christian. The performances of the actors as a whole were dynamic. The gestures and expressions of the characters were excellent. The voice quality, however, was not up to the expectations of the audience as a whole for several of the characters. Many of the actors tried too hard to make the character which they were portraying come alive. The characters of Stanley and Stella projected themselves more realistically than did the others. One has to feel a part before one can portray it. The actor must become the character.

It Is!

Everyone is talking about becoming more aware of pollution, population explosion, and events that are happening in the present. The identity of four prominent figures in the news were asked of Atlantic Christian College students to see how aware we are. The people that were asked about were William Rogers, Secretary of State; John Mitchell, attorney General of U.S.; Angela Davis who was recently captured by the FBI and is a Communist accused of killing and Ralph Nader, a well known crusader for consumer protection and author of Unsafe at any Speed.
