Sail On

air burns their lungs as their muscles start to complain. It won't be too much longer now.

But it's best not to think about it. If one thinks about it, one gets tired. And no one wants to run when they're tired.

One more turn and then the home stretch. Who's going to make it all the way today? The frat rat determined to get back in shape, refuses to slow down even for a second. And the quiet guy, trying to keep up with his tall red headed friend, pours on even more speed. Finally, they cross the highway and make the last turn.

As each runner makes that last turn, he starts his kick. The soccer player pulls way out in front and the wrestler does his best to stay on his heels. The red head kicks, but it's not enough to pass either one of the first two runners. The quiet guy pulls away from the frat rat, and the curly headed one, his breath coming more in gasp than anything else, swears he won't be last.

Then, the sign that marks the finish. The soccer player crosses first, followed close behind by the wrestler. Several seconds pass, and then the red head and the quiet guy cross next. A few seconds later the frat rat crosses, compelled only by sheer will and determination. Then finally, the curly headed guy finishes, cheered on by his co-horts, but upset about being last.

Upon merging together again, they each discuss their shared adventure between short fast breaths. Soon, they run out of things to say, and they go back to their perspective rooms.

The sun is up now, quilting the clouds with the many splendid colors of morning.

Then there's always the day after tomorrow, when they meet again.
