

The Ridgerunner

October 20, 1977

UNC-Asheville, 28804

Volume XIII, Number 9

This scene is typical of western North Carolina in the fall. The mountains of this area represent the gray zone between the northern hardwoods and the southern softwoods, hence blending the reds, yellows, oranges, and green to a unique blend. The area is a tourist mecca this time of year, even more so than during the summer. Thousands of people travel thousands of miles (and pay exorbitant motel rates) this time of year to be here. It's at your fingertips. While winter struck early in the higher elevations this year, try to make time this weekend to go out and enjoy. There's still a lot of color left—and it's free.
