Many classes close early in registration

While many classes closed last week during spring registration, the administration will open additional spring semester classes due to an accumulation of some additional funds.

The funds will result from the resignation of Dr. Tim Hollingsworth, chairman of the management department. Hollingsworth's resignation will become effective on Jan. 31, 1987. The resignation will free funds to hire more part-time faculty for the spring semester, according to Dr. Jeff Rackham, vice chancellor for academic affairs.

Students filled up 22 percent of all classes by the third day of registration, said Bill Petz, acting vice chancellor for enrollment services.

Hollingsworth will leave in January

The chairman of the management department has officially announced he will resign his position on Jan. 31, 1987.

Dr. Tim Hollingsworth said he decided to resign from his position as management department chairman and professor in August. He said his major reason for resigning was that he didn't "think the (management) department is getting the type of support it deserves from the administration." And, he added, the department needs more resources to operate efficiently.

Hollingsworth will take the position of dean of the School of Business Administration at Monmouth College in West Long Branch, N.J., on Feb. 1, 1987. There are about 5,000 students at Monmouth, with 31 faculty members in the School of Business Administration.

Hollingsworth cited several shortcomings in the management department at UNCA. He said the department needs additional faculty positions, clerical help and more equipment such as computers and software.

There are 13 full-time faculty members in the department with only one or two full-time secretaries, he said. The management department deals with 35 to 45 percent of students on campus, he said, and yet has only 12 percent of the faculty.

The management department has majors in industrial engineering, accounting and management, and between 400 and 550 students who have declared majors in one of those areas, Hollingsworth said. As an example of the dilemma, he noted that there are about 80 students interested in marketing, but the department has only one instructor in marketing.

Furthermore, the management department does not meet standards required for accreditation by the American Assembly of Colleges and Schools of Business (AACSB), Hollingsworth said.

To meet those requirements would mean that the department would have to hire two times the current number of faculty in each of eight specific departmental areas. Belonging to the AACSB would mean that more and different firms would come to UNCA to recruit students, and the students could transfer more easily to accredited business schools and to graduate schools.

While Hollingsworth said he "thinks UNCA has a great management department," he said there are not enough faculty members for the number of students. He said he notified the administration in August so it would have adequate time to find a replacement.
