Many students throughout the United States have expressed similar opinions. According to the College Press Service (CPS), these students have been involved in demonstrations on such campuses as the University of Washington, the University of Vermont and also the University of North Carolina at Charlotte.

Recently, around 600 activists from various campuses across the United States gathered at Rutgers University and agreed to organize national anti-CIA rallies in April, according to CPS.

In addition, several students at UNC-Chapel Hill are currently involved in a hunger strike protesting the CIA's upcoming visit on campus.

Kaplan said that he does not think it is appropriate for students to protest against the CIA "if they are just protesting against the presence of the CIA on campus." He said it would be appropriate to protest U.S. foreign policy. However, the CIA simply implements that policy.

"They're exercising their rights, and we're exercising our rights," he said.

Kaplan said this reaction is primarily due to misconceptions about the CIA. "They perceive the agency as some sort of law enforcement agency," he said. "We're more of a think tank."

"If they knew more about us, they wouldn't have that fear," he said.

Although many students have protested the CIA on campus, Kaplan said he has never been refused on campus by a career placement center. "We haven't had any problems in our office," he said. Kaplan said that he recruits in the Southeast where attitudes are generally more conservative, and there are not as many "liberals or radicals."

Johnston said he views the CIA simply as another employer. "There's nothing controversial about it. They're an employer, and they offer excellent employment opportunities," he said.

One former UNCA student, who said she was considering signing up for an interview, agreed with Johnston.

"I think the CIA is needed. Their methods may not be acceptable to some people, but I feel it's a branch of service that the United States needs for security," said Kim Moody, former UNCA management major.

Moody said the agency offers good benefits and the "ability to climb and excel with the organization."

Most students expressed similar opinions.

"I see them as no different from any government agency. I think they should have access like any group," said Rob Young, freshman political science major. "I believe that the CIA is just the extension of the political process of our country."

Rodney Martin, sophomore chemistry major, said, "It doesn't bother me. Maybe some good college students will straighten them out."

Freshman engineering major Steve Pisano said, "Everybody's got the right to be here as long as it publicized, and we know why they're here."

Religion

"The key to this problem is that you have to provide religious opportunities to the students without promoting religion," he said.

"We are accomplishing this by committing members of the religious community in town to provide the service. We provide them with access to campus," said Smith.

This commitment, however, is not generated from the Campus Ministry office; it is generated from the religious student organizations, Smith said.

"The Campus Ministry office is a liaison between these groups and the community," he said.

An example of this is the series of Lenten Masses, sponsored by the Catholic Student Association, which will begin tomorrow and run through March 25, said Smith.

The services will be held from 12 through 1:30 p.m. in the Highsmith Center room 37 on Feb. 19, 26 and March 11 and in the Highsmith Conference Center on March 4, 18, and 25.

"The reason for organizing the services at this particular time is that the purity of Lent is very significant of the Catholic religion. Because this is such an important time for Catholics, the university is responsible for providing a place for them to exercise their rights," said Smith.

"This is no different than the Young Democrats having a meeting on campus and inviting a political figure to come and address the group," he said.

There have been a number of complaints about the religious activities on campus. The people who are complaining think the university is not the place for religious activity, said Smith.

The argument in response to these feelings is that "being neutral to religion is not being hostile. Therefore, a ban to worship on campus would be suppression," he said.

This type of suppression is an infringement of the students' First Amendment responsibility, he said. "The important issue is that the religious activity is not required; it is volunteered. The university staff is not involved," said Smith.

This type of activity is similar to a candidate coming on campus to discuss political issues, he said.

Both types of opportunities, the political and the religious, provide and encourage an open forum of ideas, and this pooling of ideas is the university's responsibility, he said. "The nature of the university is one of the things that makes the Church and State regulations different from them than for high schools, said Smith."

The two major issues that distinguish university from secondary education is that secondary education is required and the students are minors. University attendance, on the other hand, is voluntary and a majority of the students are not minors," he said.

North Carolina finally complies with federal desegregation laws

College Press Service

Moving to end 20 years of trying to force 10, mostly southern, states to desegregate their state colleges, the U.S. Dept. of Education approved of the "substantial progress" they'd made in bringing minorities into their campus systems.

U.S. Secretary of Education William Bennett, at a Washington, D.C. news conference Feb.

10, said four states -- Arkansas, North Carolina, South Carolina and West Virginia -- were finally in "full compliance" with civil rights laws the federal government had been trying to force them to follow since 1969, when it sued 10 states that kept their campuses racially segregated.

Bennett gave 6 other states -- Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Missouri, Oklahoma and Virginia -- until the end of 1988 to tell how they'll complete specific projects -- mostly building improvements and funding of minority student recruiting efforts -- to rid themselves of "the remnants of segregation."

In its 1969 legal assault on states that still segregated their colleges, the federal government won the right to cut off funds to states that failed to integrate their campuses. Various courts imposed deadlines through the years for schools to desegregate but, while occasionally approving some state efforts, kept giving other states more time to meet the desegregation goals.

Black student enrollment nationwide actually has declined in recent years, the Dept. of Education's own figures suggest, and scores of public campuses -- the University of New Hampshire, Farleigh Dickinson, Penn State, Mississippi State, Tennessee, Nebraska and the California State University system, among others -- have year.

the job listings found in the job book, said Johnston.

"Last year there were 80 job listings. This year there will be over 120 listings," he said.

Johnston will be offering three career workshops during this semester and after graduation as well. He will be discussing job search strategies, resume writing, and interviewing skills.

The recruiters will be looking at personal characteristics. They will be looking for a professional appearance and for self-confidence in the way students present themselves, Johnston said. The recruiters scheduled to come on campus and their dates are as follows:
