The Blue Banner

September 30, 2004

FEATURES

Art exhibit pays homage to Carolina women artists

by Maribeth Kiser Staff Reporter

Page 2

The "Carolina Women Artists" exhibit, currently at the Asheville Art Museum, displays colorful landscapes and portraits of an overlooked group of artists.

"I think it is good that they are trying to bring out artists that might have been overlooked, like local women artists from this period, where mostly men artists were famous," said Kevin Schaefer, museum employee.

The exhibit features the works of 30 Southern women over a span of a 100 years, from 1850 to 1950, who overcame tremendous odds during a time of political and economic change in the South.

Oil, pastel and watercolor mediums depict familiar southern landscapes from the coast to the mountains, capturing the natural beauty over 100 years ago.

An oil painting of Charleston's Folly Beach with clean blues and greens reminds people the natural beauty before the rise of air pollution and high-rise condominiums. Another landscape of a farm that depicts the serene solitude of the country with rolling hills leading to a small house with horses grazing in the pasture.

"I really liked the rural depictions," said Julia Robinson, junior psychology major. "They give you a good idea of the rural South back in the day, especially the Carolina's. I thought they were very historically significant of what they portray.'

Many portraits displayed at this exhibit captures the femininity of the time and the graveness during a challenging period; no smiling.

All of these paintings focus on the naturalness of this era and embrace femininity through elegant flower paintings and self portraits. painted landscapes and precisely 1920s. Most of the Southeast was defined portraits, a history of the marginalized post Civil War, poschallenges women faced in the ing challenges for many Southern-South remains the theme through- ers. out this exhibit.

PHOTO COURTESY ASHEVILLE ART MUSEUM Sarah Blakeslee (1912-), Windsor, North Carolina. Untitled, 1955, oil on canvas, 21.5 x 29.5," collection of William W. Dodge, III.

The only downfall to the exhibit very little supis the lack of diversity. The oil and pastel paintings of landscapes and portraits doesn't leave said > room for individuality or Thomson, muexpression, compared to seum curator. more abstract paintings typically on display in places to show museums

'They're all one kind; places to study, pretty much all oil paintings, but and people to that's what people had to work buy with, they didn't have these fancy Museums were not very big until late 19th century there were very schools," said Robinson. "The im- the 1950s." portant thing is that they attempted

Along with the brilliantly attain the right to vote until the

"There was

Frank need vour work,

Keep in mind, women did not would go to Northern schools to study and create their artistic masterpieces, some even traveled to Europe, in order to be accepted.

The women educated in the College in Spartanburg or College "They give you a good idea of in Columthe rural South back in the day, bia, but especially the Carolina's. I there were thought they were very historimany restrictions to their program, according to Thomson.

"In the few places where women could Women wanting to rebel against study art. Most schools wouldn't

"The Pennsylvania Academy of Fines Arts and later the Art Student's League in New York City, which was run by the students, were much more supportive of women artists as a place to study and get a start."

Most of the women featured in the exhibit did not marry or keep house, while some managed to balance both a family and a career.

These women were seen as being rebellious and often clashed with the traditional views of their families.

For example, Blondelle Octavia Malone, featured in the exhibit, went to New York to study art and her family sent a chaperone with her.

"Women could do things, but people thought they were strange," said Thomson. "People would haul you off or lock you in the back room.'

Another artist featured in the exhibit, Elizabeth Augusta Chant, came from England and then went to Minnesota where her family had her committed.

Once she got out she went to Wilmington and never returned to Minnesota, all because she rebelled against the social standards of women, according to Thomson.

"I think the paintings are so South either studied at Converse important because these women didn't have any training and weren't encouraged to have careers and do things outside the home," said Robinson.

> Many of the women's successful careers included exhibiting their works, teaching art and giving back to their community.

Some of them even lived off of commissions from their work, while others suffered.

"All of these people were serious about their artwork," said Thomson.

'They helped find the museums in Asheville, Wilmington and Spartanburg.'

'Sky Captain' flies with first class eye. candy

by Chris Beck Staff Reporter

"Sky Captain and the World St Tomorrow," reminiscent of the Par "Casablanca" and "Lost in Space" days, brings modern electronics and "Pe digital effects together with a nos jus talgic 1940s look.

Science-fiction relies heavily of d special effects and when that hap pens, sometimes the story suffers dri said Jason Tobin of Asheville.

The movie offers a pastiche d to'a ideas from 1930s and 1940s comit get books, radio serials and big-screen war romantic comedies. Set in an ani mated New York City, movie the Ne ater marquees advertise "Wuthering con Heights" and "The Wizard of Oz" cu placing the year at 1939 and fore by casting a bizarre development in which director Kerry Conran wil q resuscitate a long-dead person through computer-generated of the magic.

Reporter Polly Perkin (Gwyneth Paltrow) takes us on; journey through an obviously predictable story dealing with disap pearing scientists in the New York area

The plot seems cribbed from the l old adventure serials, only deco rated for a demandingly moden audience. In1939 New York, the city gets attacked by a monolithic G swarm of mega-robots.

As an ace reporter, Perkinstakes the case and promptly enlists the aid of her strong-jawed former lover Ha Sky Captain Joe Sullivan (Jude As Law). Once the hero saves the day side he flies off to base where we meet the brains behind the equipment dri Dex Dearborn (Giovanni Ribisi).

After chancing upon a few enew choice clues, Joe and Polly eventually head off to a wild array of exotic locales, stopping along the way to rescue various sidekicks and battle an ever-eclectic collection of supremely cool looking robots. Up to this point the audience has seen a multitude of digital effects like fades, cross dissolves, overlap ping and 3D modeled backdrops. It would appear that the post-production team took a beating on this one considering the whole film was bo shot against a blue screen with everything computer generated except p for the actors. Conran shot each extra and av tor individually so they could be F manipulated easily without having to shoot the scenes again. Although 1 effective at bringing this to life, the tu characters appeared washed out and static, compared to their back th ground. "It's not a seamless integration of animation and film," said Bryan, lin Taubert of Asheville. Conran tries to cover seams be tween humans and animation with a forgiving gray-brown palette and haloed lighting. This approach works sometimes, but at others the actors seem too defined in the foreground and call attention to the picture's competing elements. In a few scenes, Paltrow and Law occupy the same frame but do not appeal to play off each other. "It just looks cheesy," said Taubert. "It doesn't look as smooth as I've seen animation before."

review

port for artists in the South,' "You to do it. It was a step for women." the traditional role of housewife accept women," said Thomson.

art.

cally significant of what they portray."" Julia Robinson junior psychology major shows flipside to war in Iraq ontrol Koom

by Apryl Blakeney Staff Reporter

Ever since Donald Rumsfeld described the Arab satellite television network Al-Jazeera as the "mouthpiece of Osama bin Laden," many Americans are left confused about the networks' agenda. Documentarian Jehane Noujaim takes viewers behind the scenes of the Arabic-language network in the film "Control Room," now playing at the Fine Arts Theater.

Egyptian-born and Harvard-educated Noujaim recorded military activity in Iraq from the walls of Central Command (CentCom), a makeshift media village in Qatar, 700 miles from Baghdad. The media center houses reporters from across the globe including CNN, Fox News, NBC, BBC and Al-Jazeera.

In the film, through the ears of Al-Jazeera, we hear Bush's threat of invasion, and through Arabic eyes we see civilian blood shed, the tumbling of Hussein's statue and the anarchy of a nation left without rule.

With Qatari money in hand, former employees of the BBC launched Al-Jazeera in 1996, making it the first independent news channel in the Middle East. Though disliked by many Arabic governments and even banned in Saudi Arabia, it remains the most popular Arabic news channel, reaching over 40 million viewers.

"All the Middle Eastern countries are really dictatorships," said Loubna Dardna, Moroccan native. "There is no democracy of expression or of speech, therefore, there is no democracy of the media. But there is still that need to understand the issues of the Arabic and Islamic people so Al-Jazeera sentiment, but sellcame along, and they recognize the concept ing anti-Arabic menof media in the Arabic world. Now people are listening to other Arab people who talk with their language and address their issues. They deal deeply with our problems and not from western eyes with western democracy, because that is useless to us."

The film opens to the voice of Samir Khader, the cynically-engaging, chain-smoking Senior Producer of Al-Jazeera. He boldly states, "You can not wage a war without propaganda.

Though it remains a shockingly honest ascertain, moviegoers will most likely remember him for confessing "between us, if I were offered a job at Fox News, I would take it to exchange the Arab nightmare for the American dream.'

This is the man Rumsfeld claims is a liar, tarnishing and twisting the American image. "Fox is propaganda, though I am sure they say that about Al-Jazeera too, but there is just no truth in the way that they demonize Arabs and demonize Islam," said

Dardna.

tone that sadly suggests that being an

Arabic nationalist or

American patriot

means railing against the opposing nation.

The film implies that

Fox reiterates this misconception by

marketing patriotic

tality

review

The patient and empathetic CentCom Press Officer suggests a different outlook when comparing American media to Eastern media, an analysis that takes place in various forms throughout the film.

"It benefits Al-Jazeera to play to Arab nationalism because that is their audience, just like Fox plays to American patriotism for the exact same reason," said Lieutenant Josh Rushing in the film.

However, the documentary seems to contain an underlying

> "Fox is propaganda, though I am sure they say that about Al-Jazeera too, but there is just no truth in the way that they demonize Arabs and demonize Islam."

> > Loubna Dardna Moroccan native

"It would be ridiculous to think that Al-Jazeera would take issues of Texas or Nebraska, but that is how I see Fox," said Dardna. "They think they are an expert on Middle Eastern issues and Islamic and Arabic ideas. That is like Al-Jazeera talking about how Nebraska should be invaded because 'really Nebraska isn't doing very well' and we should re-liberate them and offer only news about Nebraska 24/7

PHOTO COURTESY OF MAGNOLIA PICTURES

Lt. Josh Rushing, U.S. Military press officer in "Control Room," a Magnolia Pictures release. (c) Magnolia Pictures.

> But unlike Fox, Al-Jazeera doesn't do that. They deal with the problems and issues of their own country.

At the heart of the film is the ethical question of media accuracy, honesty and objectivity in reporting.

It sheds light upon news manipulation at the lens of American journalists attempting to sway our political ideals related to the War in Iraq but it also exposes unfairness within Al-Jazeera.

When an American reporter questioned a lot inspired.

an Al-Jazeera spokeswoman about the biases in Arabic news, the spokeswoman calmly answered with a rhetorical question "And what about the biases in American media?"

The spokeswoman continued to say "objectivity is a mirage," when dealing with something as passionate as war.

Noujaim admits growing up with contradictory news sources inspired her to examine Al-Jazeera.

As an example of these concerns, Noujaim explored Al-Jazeera's coverage during the fall of Hussein's statue and analyzed the liberated Iraqi people who came out to celebrate. Only to find that, in contrast to American news, the square was not full with grateful Iraqi's ready to embrace there new found freedom. Instead, only 15 boys circled around the fallen Hussein.

With this film, it's the realization of unknown realities, misguided truth and feelings of puppetry that cause viewers to leave feeling a little betrayed, a little appalled and

Although the integration may not have succeeded in raising the bar for quality, it did leave a good impression for Tobin.

"I liked the visual concept," said Tobin. "It's like 'Star Wars' meets 'Indiana Jones. It's a nice movie 10 see just for fun, and I would go see it again."

The plot line is simple: to find

SEE SKY ON PAGE 3