of college language.

3. A junior college does not offer cheap education. The cost of education at a junior college, it is true, is usually less to the student than at a four-year institution. But the education is not cheap. The junior college uses two methods to keep costs low for the student:

(a) Economy. By offering only two years of work it is possible for the college to use its resources efficiently and economically. It is a maxim of education that the greater the spread of courses and the more advanced the level of the work, the greater the cost. The concentration of courses at the two-year level is economical, therefore.

(b) Supplementary funds. For every dollar a student pays at Brevard College the College must raise a dollar from endowment and gifts. This is often true of other colleges, junior and senior. Brevard College through economical operation and the raising of supplementary funds actually gives students a $1600.00 education for $800.00.

4. The junior college is not a dull college socially and culturally. On the contrary, there are more activities per individual or organization than in the senior college. Many opportunities for enrichment are available to the junior college student who has his or her academic work well in hand—opportunities that might be delayed in the senior college for a full two years.

teams which engage in a full program of intercollegiate sports. The Brevard College basketball team—which boasts of four honor students—played 23 games this season, won a Jaycee Junior College Tournament, and is still to play, as of this writing, in a conference tournament. Brevard places teams in intercollegiate competition in baseball, track, tennis, and golf too. Freshmen join sophomores in glee club and choir tours. In the first two years of college—not waiting
