Summer 1982

Hi! We're back. Between moving into our new office, putting on Gay Awareness Week, and fighting for continued funding, we managed to let Lambda slip to the side. We hope to be back on a regular schedule in the fall. Meanwhile, here's a quick rundown on what's going on here this summer. Thanks for your patience and support.

Other summer socials (outings, trips, picnics) are being planned. Call us if you'd like to help set something up.

HOUSING

Pink Triangles is a very moving and powerful film about homophobia--the fear and persecution of lesbians and gay men. It is also a film about the nature of discrimination and oppression. The film was made by a collective of nine women and men--lesbian, gay and straight.

Cathy Hoffman, a member of the collective, talked about some of the things they wanted out of the film. "We wanted to attack some of the stereotypes and myths, but not so much through human interest stories as through documenting that sort of discrimination. And then to say to people that if there are ways in your life in which you feel discriminated against, we think you can identify with part of what the gay experience is all about."

She was surprised by the reception the film received. "When the film ended (opening night) there was a moment of silence. All of us were standing there wondering what people thought. Then people started clapping and clapping and crying and cheering and everyone just went wild, standing and cheering. It was so moving that our community approved and appreciated the work we had done."
