INTRAMURAL MATCH SUCCESS

Fists were flying, blood was flowing, and people's voices were hurting from overuse last Tuesday night at the intramural boxing matches held in the high school gymnasium under the auspices of the men's athletic association and finished under the term "successful."

Winston Stroud and Henry Dunstan introduced the bouts with fine experienced fighting. Both boys fought a clean fight and took all that was handed out by the other. Dunstan, being the little more scientific and experienced, came out as winner.

In the second fight of the evening, we saw a boy who could take all of the punishment handed by our big president, Butch Norvell. Norvell had the advantage over Martin Garrett all the way. Butch took this fight, but he will not forget it.

Of course there was, as usual, a clown show. Sherwood Parrish, who never saw a ring before, and Stanley Patten were doing their best not to hurt each other. The boys came out of their corners in the first round with revenge in their eyes. Both came to the center of the ring and started throwing their blown-up fists right and left, landing on the average of one blow out of five. After standing around talking, they went into a clinch, both fell to the floor. The bell.

The ten-second bell rang and the demons started again. They were called back by referee Waters. Parrish looked as though he could not wait five seconds until he could get to Patten. Finally, the bell. They started eyeing each other, neither knowing what to do.
