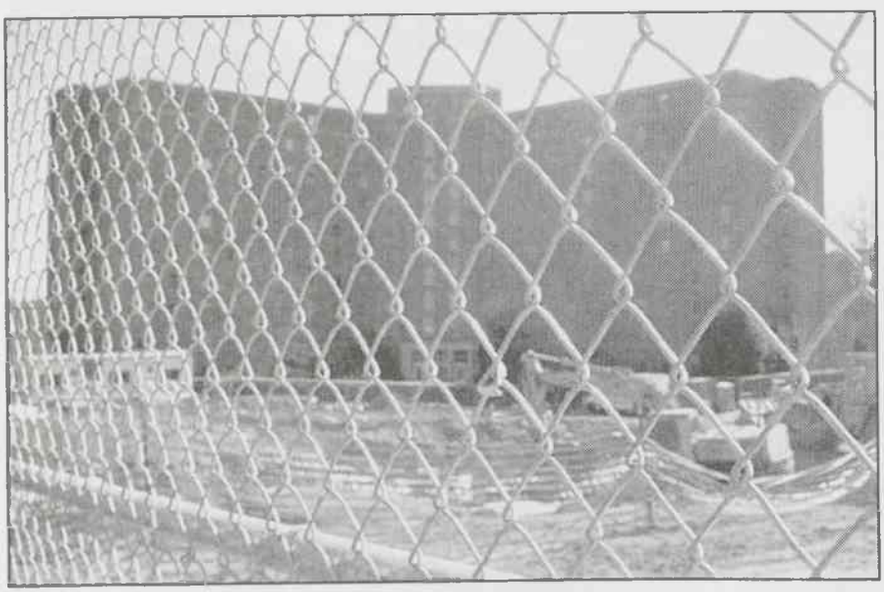
Hinton James: The Penitentiary



With all the construction going on in the area, it seems that Chapel Hill should change its name to Construction Hill. I mean, with the renovations to the Student Union and the building of four new dorms on South Campus, there are very few places on campus that do not have some construction going on. All this construction on campus has really caused an inconvenience for almost everyone on campus.

However, there is one place on campus that has been inconvenienced the most. Hinton James really got the worst end of this whole construction thing. Honestly, being the most southern dorm on campus already made Hinton James way out of the way. Then, they just had to put that fence up, supposedly for the students' safety. However, it honestly seemed like the fence was put up just to separate Hinton James from the rest of the dorms on South Campus. Like prison inmates, students that stay in HJ were isolated from the rest of campus. Look at the long hike we have to make just to get from HJ to Chase in order to eat. And let's not start talking about the hike that we had to make if we wanted to visit a friend in Morrison. The fence around Hinton James also was an inconvenience to anyone that wanted to come visit a friend in HJ. With the detour, walking to the Main Quad would almost be closer than going to HJ.

Luckily, the fence that kept students in HJ from crossing the street in front of Ehringhaus was taken down (after the students in HJ tried to take it down themselves). Honestly, it probably had nothing to do with the students' constantly destroying the fence, but we can't help but think that we had a little to do with it.

E-haus: It's Not So Bad

As a two-year resident of Carolina's luxurious South Campus, I am constantly surrounded by what seems to be a never-ending phenomena, construction. All over South Campus, from Ehringhaus, to Hinton James, to Morrison, bus loads of men come early in the morning and begin yet another day's work constructing new
